I think it is well for that to be done. It saves litigation. The claims of the United States against Tennessee aggregate probably from $800,000 to $1,000,000. Those of Tennessee amount to nearly as much. The matter is of long standing. It is a stale claim in its nature. I may say that Tennessee has not been derelict in this matter, as its commissioners, from the time the original resolution was passed, in 1898, have been anxious for this adjustment. The State wants to get it out of the way, but this obstacle came up continually. I must further say that on several occasions when a time was agreed upon to settle it matters of great importance arose here at Washington and engaged the attention of the Cabinet officers, who are made commissioners ex officio, to such an extent that it was continued on that account, and properly, in some instances, as I remember.

The original resolution provides for a report to be made to Congress upon this matter. This amendment specifically provides that it shall not be final or binding until there is an act of Congress upon the report. The object of this is to waive that question for the present and bring the whole matter before Congress, in order that we may have an adjustment upon the merits in that way.

The question of the extent of the pardon involved in the general amnesty law that was granted, I believe, in December, 1865, and its effect upon such claims as this, has received a good deal of consideration by the courts, and there are some very grave questions and nice distinctions involved in that. Furthermore, the question whether or not a State could be disloyal so as to affect its interest has been before the Supreme Court of the United States. I have those cases before me, or a reference to them, and it has held that it could not be; that the action of the general assemblies and of the State officers in passing seceding ordinances were null and void; that they were beyond their power. The term "ultra vires" might be used as to them. Those, however, are all questions that will come up when the report is made by the several commissioners for the respective parties, and they can be settled then. I had not prepared myself to go into the matter of these several claims. I simply desire to get the award made now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice the joint resolution does not refer particularly to the State of Tennessee. It says, "The claims of the parties, respectively," and, of course, that may include individuals who were disloyal to the Government. I would not want to have it understood that Congress was going to pay the claim of any person who was disloyal to the Government at the time of our Civil War.

I recognize the fact, however, Mr. President, that this compromise or settlement is not to be effective or final until approved by Congress, and that is about the only saving grace there is in this proposition. With that amendment made to the joint resolution, I suppose all it amounts to is that they shall investigate and find out how much the State of Tennessee and the individual citizens of Tennessee claim against the Government for the taking over of the railroad in that State.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will correct the Senator. He misunderstood me in that respect. There is no claim of any individual involved in the submission of this matter. It is the claims of the respective Governments, the Federal Government and the State of Tennessee.

Mr. SMOOT. There is another thing. Under the terms of the joint resolution the commissioners are to consider, adjust, and settle the claims on their merits "and upon such terms as to amounts, allowance of interest," and so forth. It seems to me that the words "and so forth" ought to be stricken from the joint resolution and that it should apply only to amounts and allowance of interest. I can not imagine anything else outside of that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I really do not think that would affect the meaning of it. If there were no claims, of course the commission would not consider them. That part was intended to describe the character of the claims.

Mr. SMOOT. It is rather an ambiguous phrase to use in legislation.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to having it stricken out. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the words "and so forth" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SHIELDS. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 1, after the word "interest" and the comma, strike out "and so forth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move to insert the word "and" after the word "amounts," so that it will read: "amounts and allowance of interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Committee on Claims will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, strike out the numeral "8" and insert "34"; and on page 3, line 2, after the word "parties," insert "The said compromise or settlement is not to be effective or final until approved by Congress," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the said S. J. Res. 34 be, and is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following, namely:

"The claims of the parties respectively shall be considered, adjusted, and settled on their merits without regard to any question of loyalty or disloyalty and upon such terms as to amounts and allowance of interest as shall do equal and impartial justice to the parties. The said compromise or settlement is not to be effective or final until approved by Congress."

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to amend S. J. Res. 34, approved May 12, 1898, entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States.'"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Claims report amendments to the preamble, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the second line of the first whereas strike out "8, approved May 4, 1898," and insert "34, approved May 12, 1898," and in the fifth line of the second whereas strike out "8" and insert "34," so as to make the preamble read:

Whereas the resolution in the caption mentioned, being S. J. Res. 34, approved May 12, 1898, providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States and of the State of Tennessee, provides that the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War of the United States, as representatives of the United States, and agents or commissioners to be appointed by the State of Tennessee, as representatives of the State, shall proceed by conference to compromise, adjust, and settle the claims in the resolution mentioned, but that the compromise or settlement shall not be effective as final until approved by Congress; and

Whereas at conference held between said representatives they have been unable to proceed because the said representatives of the United States have insisted that the settlement or compromise of the claims of the State of Tennessee under said S. J. Res. 34 should be precluded by the consideration that the State of Tennessee was during the Civil War, in the resolution mentioned, a public enemy and in rebellion, and not entitled to compensation for any losses suffered by reason of the action of the United States in suppressing such rebellion; and

Whereas it was the true intent and purpose of said resolution to provide for the compromise, adjustment, and settlement of all the matters in the resolution mentioned, upon terms that would do equal and exact justice to the parties, on the merits of their claims; and

Whereas it is not deemed just that the consideration of the claims of Tennessee should, or can be, precluded, or the same disallowed upon the ground that the State was a public enemy and in rebellion: Now, therefore, be it

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. JONES. The bill (S. 5495) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls was temporarily laid aside. I call it up and desire to offer an amendment to it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES. At the end of the bill I move to add:

To the proper authorities of Columbia County, in the State of Washington, two condemned bronze or brass cannon and a suitable outfit of cannon balls; to be placed in the public square in the city of Dayton.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I also move to add to the bill:

To the order of the Dan McCook Post, No. 195, Grand Army of the Republic, in the State of Washington, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. STONE. I should like to know where all the plunder is to come from. If there is any of it left——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let it be divided pro rata.

Mr. STONE. If there is no other use for it, I should like to get a little for my State.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to add to the bill:

To the city of Hope, N. Dak., one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I also move to add to the bill:

To deliver to the Fort Totten Indian School, at Fort Totten, in the State of North Dakota, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece, with its carriage and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], I wish to offer some amendments on their behalf. For the Senator from Maine I move to add to the bill:

To the Caribou Board of Trade, in the town of Caribou, State of Maine, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece, with its carriage and cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. For the Senator from Kansas I move to insert:

To James Shields Post, No. 57, Grand Army of the Republic, Wellington, Kans., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces.

To the city of Alma, Kans., to be mounted in the courthouse square in said city of Alma, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment. I move to insert:

To the city of Boulder, in the State of Colorado, for use of Nathaniel Lyon Relief Corps, No. 21, Department of Colorado and Wyoming, Auxiliary to Post No. 5, Grand Army of the Republic, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move as an amendment that two brass cannon and the other things be granted to the city of Nevada, Mo.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To the city of Nevada, Mo., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move to add the following:

To the city of Carthage, Mo., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I also move to add the following:

To the city of Chillicothe, Mo., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I move to add to the bill:

To the city of Hamilton, in the State of Montana, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I move to add to the bill:

To the city of Vermilion, S. Dak., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

To the city of Redfield, S. Dak., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I propose the following amendment. I move to add to the bill:

To the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

To the city of Nashville, Tenn., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I move to add to the bill:

To the city of Muskogee, Okla., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

To Oklahoma City, Okla., two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. As there are quite a few hungry Senators absent, I object to the passage of the bill at this time. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota objects to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I rise to a point of order. The bill has been considered, and the Chair had presented the question to the Senate as to whether there would be any objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not. It is proper for an objection to be made at any stage of the proceeding on the bill. The next business on the calendar will be stated.

CLAIMS AGAINST COLOMBIA.

Senate resolution 367, for the printing of certain documents relating to claims against the Government of Colombia as a Senate document, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over.

JAMES B. SMOCK.

The bill (S. 4288) to remove the charge of desertion against James B. Smock was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James B. Smock, who was a private of Company H, One hundred and sixty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Drafted Militia Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 27th day of November, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of James B. Smock."

SPANISH WAR PENSIONS, ETC.

The bill (H. R. 13044) to pension widows and minor and helpless children of officers and enlisted men who served during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who had to leave the Chamber, requested the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] when this calendar number came up, and he in turn being compelled to leave requested me, to ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

IMPORTATION OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

The bill (S. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

INDIAN LANDS.

The bill (S. 3899) to provide for the acquiring of additional lands by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments on page 2, line 5, to strike out the words "for other purposes in connection with the Indian Service, or"; in line 14, before the word "protection," to insert the word "fire"; on page 3, line 4, after the word "any," to insert the words "ballast or construction"; in line 7, after the word "any," to insert "such"; in line 8, after the word "allotment," to insert "as herein provided"; in line 13, after the word "protection," to strike out "of or," and in the same line, after the word "from," to insert "fire of"; and at the end of the bill to add the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not be authorized under the foregoing provisions of this act to grant any land which may control any water power or which contains any mineral or oil.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 1 of an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910," approved March 3, 1909, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That when in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior it is necessary for any railway company owning or operating a line of railway in any Indian reservation or through any lands reserved for an Indian agency, or through any lands which have been allotted in severalty to an individual Indian, under any law or treaty, but which have not been conveyed to the allottee with full power of alienation, to acquire lands in such Indian reservations, Indian lands, or Indian allotments for reservoirs, rights of way for ditch or pipe lines used in connection with any such reservoirs, material or ballast pits, for the construction, operation, repair, and maintenance of its railway, or for the purpose of providing any manner of fire protection to its line of railway, or the property adjacent thereto, the said Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant such lands to any such railway company upon such terms and conditions and such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the said Secretary.

"That when any railway company desiring to secure the benefits of this provision shall file with the Secretary of the Interior an application describing the lands which it desires to purchase, and upon the payment of the price agreed upon, the said Secretary shall cause such lands to be conveyed to the railway company applying therefor, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem proper: Provided, That no lands shall be acquired under the provisions of this act in greater quantity than 40 acres for any one reservoir and 160 acres for any ballast or construction material or ballast pit, or to the extent of more than one reservoir and one material and ballast pit in any one section of 6 miles of any such railway in any such Indian reservation, Indian land, or Indian allotment as herein provided: Provided further, That the lands acquired for any ditch or water pipe line shall not exceed 15 feet in width on each side of the center line of such ditch or pipe line: And provided further, That the land acquired for the protection from fire of any line of railway shall be taken only at such places along the line of the railway company applying therefor, as in the judgment of the Secretary may be necessary, and shall be taken in strips adjoining and parallel with the right of way of the railway company taking the same and shall not exceed 150 feet in width: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not be authorized under the foregoing provisions of this act to grant any land which may control any water power or which contains any mineral or oil."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TOWN SITES IN MONTANA.

The bill (S. 4180) to validate title to certain town sites in the State of Montana was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I received a letter the other day in relation to this bill, calling attention to some matters connected with the locating of the land, and so forth. Among other things, the writer says:

I do not believe that Senator MYERS was familiar with the circumstances when he reported this bill.

Mr. MYERS. I did not hear the Senator. I will have to ask for order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SMOOT. The other day I received a letter from Redstone, Mont., in relation to this bill, giving a history, as the writer understood, of the former locations of the land and the scrip application, and the writer also says:

I do not believe that Senator MYERS was familiar with the circumstances when he reported this bill.

The writer of the letter objects to the bill, and I have not had time to take up the matter with the Senator. I ask that the bill may go over for to-day, and I will submit this letter to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. Of course, if the Senator after hearing me still desires to object, the bill will have to go over. My colleague [Mr. WALSH], I understand, intends to offer a substitute which, he thinks, will meet some objections to the bill; and after the substitute has been offered, I do not believe there will be any objection to it at all. The history of the bill is set out very fully in the report, and if the Senator will listen to the substitute which, I understand, my colleague intends to offer, perhaps he will not then have any objection. If he does, of course I would not have anything further to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I very much prefer that the bill should go over for to-day, and I will submit this letter to him, and we will talk about what is in the letter in relation to the Northern Pacific lieu-land scrip and other matters, and then I would have no objection to it if it is all straight.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator makes the request that the bill go over, I think the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has an amendment which he purposes to offer which will remove any objections that can possibly be urged in the letter.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that under the provisions of the law where land is selected and set aside as coal land there is no provision whatever for the location of anything but homesteads and regular settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that thoroughly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just let me make it clear. There is no provision for a town site. Where the land has been selected, and whole counties nearly are selected as coal lands and new railroads are being built, and three of them are putting their lines through that country, there ought to be some way of locating a town in those places.

I understand that the amendment which will be offered to the bill will apply generally, so that where there has been a lieu-land selection made, without describing the tract at all, there may be selected as much as 160 acres for town-site purposes. If we do not get the bill through at this session you can not have town sites in that whole section of the country, and the matter will be delayed until Congress shall have acted upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to say that there will be an amendment offered providing that hereafter any lieu-land scrip of the Northern Pacific can be located on land withdrawn?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no. These lands can be taken for town-site purposes where a proper selection, of course, has been made. I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] can better explain it by reading his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will pardon me for a moment, I could not give my approval to the bill as reported to the Senate, but I think that it ought to be passed and the relief ought to be granted to those people. As the Senator from Utah doubtless knows, that section of our State is being very rapidly settled at this time. Towns spring up overnight. They are creating new counties so fast in that part of the State that I can not keep track of them. Many of the town sites have been laid out upon lands which have been located by virtue of the soldiers' additional homestead scrip or by virtue of the Northern Pacific lieu-land scrip, and the title to all those lands is under a cloud by reason of the fact that the land has been classified as coal land or it is reserved for classification as coal land.

I have been obliged lately to investigate very carefully the whole subject matter to which I have no doubt the letter relates. I appeared before the Secretary of the Interior about three weeks ago as representing settlers there who are urging against the contention of the Northern Pacific Railroad that they are entitled to a large portion of this land under the Northern Pacific selection. I have no doubt the letter refers to that claim.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is one of the matters referred to in the letter.

Mr. WALSH. I felt sure it was, but I will say to the Senator that it is a matter quite separate and apart from this. I introduced a bill the other day to repeal the act of March 3, 1911, under which the Northern Pacific selections were made. I will say to the Senator that that whole region at the time the map of definite location was filed, in 1882, was an Indian reservation. It was opened under the provisions of the act of 1888, and it was made subject to only four classes of entry—homestead, preemption, town-site, and mineral-land entry; but notwithstanding that, the department went on and permitted entries of all classes. Then an act was passed in 1911 extending over these lands the general land laws, and under that the Northern Pacific has gone in and selected 150 acres of the land. But that is something entirely separate from this. Those selections are made, I will say to the Senator, under the provisions of the general act granting the lands to the Northern Pacific. Those are not town sites at all. There is certain scrip belonging to the Northern Pacific that is assignable and has been used extensively for the purpose of locating town sites in that locality, and, likewise, the soldiers' additional homestead scrip has been used.

This bill was intended to cover the case of 280 acres located with Northern Pacific scrip and 40 acres located by means of the soldiers' additional homestead scrip. That has been granted, town sites have been sold, and people have gone there. The report, I will say, gives a long list of improvements that have been made by people who have bought lots in those various towns, and now patent is denied by reason of the fact that the lands are coal lands or they are reserved for classification as coal lands. The purpose of the bill is to permit those to go to patent, but patent for the surface right only, reserving to the Government the coal land.

Mr. SMOOT. I so understand it. Let me read a part of this letter.

Mr. WALSH. I will be very glad to hear it all.

Mr. SMOOT. The letter says:

The bill, which I believe is Senate bill 4180, also cedes surface rights to the soldier's additional homestead application filed by one W. F. Hanks as assignee of the right of William H. Shaffer. The land embraced in Mr. Hanks's application, while not a part of the town site of Redstone, is contiguous thereto and is also contiguous to the present homestead entry of one Joseph O. Oswald.

Mr. Hanks's application was rejected by both the local land office and by the General Land Office at Washington for the reason that the land embraced in the same had been withdrawn as coal lands and not subject to entry under soldier's additional application. Mr. Hanks allowed the time for appeal to expire without taking any action, and it was then that Mr. Oswald, the owner of 280 acres of Government homestead adjoining, filed an additional homestead application for the same land. His application was suspended pending final disposition of the soldier's additional application for Hanks, and for some reason or other we are unable to induce the General Land Office to close the case as to Hanks and issue notice of allowance to Oswald.

I do not believe that Senator MYERS was familiar with the circumstances when he reported this bill, or he surely would not have included the clause to which I have referred. Inasmuch as Oswald has tendered an application for the land, and it being subject to entry thereunder, and it also being the only application that has ever been tendered for the land under which the same was subject to entry, it seems that equitable consideration would entitle him to a filing upon this land.

On behalf of Mr. Oswald allow me to say that we will surely appreciate any effort you may see fit to extend in his behalf. I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

S. E. PAUL.

That is the position taken by Mr. S. E. Paul, of Redstone, Mont., an attorney in that city.

Mr. WALSH. If the fact is, Mr. President, that anyone claims to have made a filing on this land and is contesting it against the soldier's additional location, of course no act of Congress ought to pass directing the soldier's additional-land application to go to patent. With one particular objection to the act as it stands, I have, however, made it general, and provided that any entry made shall proceed to patent, though they may be classified or set aside as coal lands. There is a report accompanying the bill which tells us there are no adverse filings at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why I voted that the bill should be reported from the committee. I did so on the report that came from the department; but evidently there are from this letter adverse claims to the land.

Mr. WALSH. I think, however, that all rights will be reserved if the substitute which I propose should be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill specifically states—

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept for surface rights only Northern Pacific lieu-land selection heretofore made.

The Secretary is directed by Congress to do that; and unless an amendment was offered to the bill and accepted stating that it shall not interfere with any rights, of course he could not do otherwise than to issue the patent.

Mr. WALSH. For greater safety, it would be wise to put such a provision as that in. I drafted it upon the report of the department that there were no adverse claims of any kind, but I should be glad, at the suggestion of the Senator, to add such a clause.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator read the amendment he desires to offer.

Mr. WALSH. It follows the language of the bill, but makes it general:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept for surface rights only Northern Pacific lieu-land selection heretofore filed——

Mr. SMOOT. That would be worse than this bill. I very much prefer to have this bill pass.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator had better wait until I get through.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether there is anything in this bill that involves the question of leasing by the Government. I have not been able to read the provisions of the bill, but I have heard the Senator's statement as to the public lands.

Mr. WALSH. I am very glad to reassure the Senator from Colorado upon that point.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no provision in the bill as to leasing. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah objects, and the bill goes over.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The resolution (S. Res. 376) requesting the President to open diplomatic negotiations for the settlement of the Panama Canal tolls question by international arbitration was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the motion?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Mississippi objects to its indefinite postpontment I will ask that the resolution go over under Rule IX. Then it can be brought up on motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to that.

Mr. BURTON. The resolution ought to be disposed of in some way. It was introduced when the bill was pending for the repeal of the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of Panama tolls.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why I asked that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BURTON. Upon the passage of that bill there is no further reason for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Ohio is very much mistaken. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] who introduced the resolution thought that perhaps he could get it as an amendment upon that act. Then afterwards it was thought well to make up a case between the two Governments and have that question arbitrated so that it could be settled forever.

The matter is at present in this condition, that a succeeding Congress could reenact the law which we repealed. That would again bring up the question. So it was thought by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and by me and several others that it was well to settle the question and have it settled for all time in order that if Congress ever did want to reenact it the right to do so would be thoroughly established, or the wrong in doing it would have been arbitrated, so that Congress would not attempt to do it. I object to its going through at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under objection.

BUSINESS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 5210) to correct the military record of Nelson T. Saunders was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The resolution (S. Res. 393) to print the pamphlet entitled "Doniphan's Expedition," containing an account of the conquest of New Mexico, with illustrations, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over.

The bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let that go over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) to determine the rights of the State of Colorado and of its citizens in the beneficial uses of waters of the Rio Grande and its tributaries within the boundaries of Colorado was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution goes over.

The bill (H. R. 4541) to consolidate the veterinary service, United States Army, and to increase its efficiency, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a Senator deeply interested in this bill, who is not present, asked me to request that it go over to-day.

Mr. KERN. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I promised the Senator to whom I have referred that I would ask that the bill go over for to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

E. F. ANDERSON.

The bill (H. R. 14404) for the relief of E. F. Anderson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to quiet and confirm the title of and to issue patent to E. F. Anderson in and to the west half of the northwest quarter of section 30, township 15, range 17, Noxubee County, Miss., as assignee of the conveyance of She-uk-oh.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. F. JACKSON.

The bill (H. R. 14405) for the relief of C. F. Jackson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to quiet and confirm the title of and to issue patent to C. F. Jackson in and to the northwest quarter of section 27, township 15, range 16, Noxubee County, Miss., as assignee of the conveyance by McKee Folsom.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 4282) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "The Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll," and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 5977) to authorize Bryan and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala., was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

Mr. SHEPPARD subsequently said: Mr. President, recurring to Senate bill 5977, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina, who objected to its consideration, if he has any particular objection to the bill? It is an ordinary bridge bill in which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is very deeply interested, and he wishes it passed to-day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know nothing in the world about the bill, except a certain Senator, who is not here, asked me to object to its consideration.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well, Mr. President.

LAND ENTRIES IN WYOMING.

The bill (S. 5629) for the relief of certain persons who made entry under the provisions of section 6, act of May 29, 1908, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, after line 8, to insert:

Provided, That this legislation is to be construed as only removing the objection with relation to transfer heretofore raised by the Interior Department against said entries, and is not to be construed as confirming entries, if any, made for lands not subject to entry or entries made by persons not entitled thereto: Provided further, That if any of the said entries under the remedial act or amendments thereto have been canceled and the lands embraced therein reentered by intervening adverse claimants, such canceled entries are not to be reinstated and validated by this act, but the right to make new locations in lieu thereof for lands subject to homestead entry is hereby granted.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all entries made by beneficiaries under section 6 of the act of Congress approved May 29, 1908, entitled "An act authorizing a resurvey of certain townships in the State of Wyoming, and for other purposes" (35 Stats., 465), in connection with which such beneficiaries have submitted proof of their compliance with the homestead law in Wisconsin and where such proof shows full five years' residence and improvements on the Wisconsin land, to which their title failed by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Co. v. Forsythe (159 U. S., 46), whether such entry is now being asserted by the original entryman or by his transferee, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to issue patents thereon: Provided, That this legislation is to be construed as only removing the objection with relation to transfer, heretofore raised by the Interior Department against said entries, and is not to be construed as confirming entries, if any, made for lands not subject to entry or entries made by persons not entitled thereto: Provided further, That if any of the said entries under the remedial act or amendments thereto have been canceled and the lands embraced therein reentered by intervening adverse claimants, such canceled entries are not to be reinstated and validated by this act, but the right to make new locations in lieu thereof for lands subject to homestead entry is hereby granted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER SUPPLY OF NEVADAVILLE, COLO.

The bill (S. 2518) granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of water supply was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in section 3, page 4, after line 9, to insert:

Provided, That there is reserved to the United States all gas, oil, coal, and other mineral deposits and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: And provided further, That the cost of the survey mentioned in section 2 of this act shall be paid by the said town of Nevadaville: And provided further, That in the event said lands are ever abandoned and not used for municipal purposes all right, title, and interest therein to be conveyed to the said town of Nevadaville by this act shall be forfeited and the same shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORIGINAL ORDINANCE OF SECESSION OF LOUISIANA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 295) authorizing the Secretary of War to return to the State of Louisiana the original ordinance of secession adopted by said State, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to return to the State of Louisiana the original ordinance of secession which was adopted by the people of that State in convention assembled and which is now in the possession of the War Department.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOAN OF TENTS AND CAMP EQUIPAGE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) authorizing the governor of any State to loan to military colleges and schools within his State such tents and camp equipage as have been issued to the State by the United States under the provisions of existing laws, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "when it can be spared," and in line 9, after the word "issued," to insert "or shall be issued," so as to read:

That the governor of any State is authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, to lend for short periods to the military colleges and schools within his State to which Army officers are detailed as professors of military science and tactics such tents, flies, poles, ridges, pins, and camp equipage as have been issued or shall be issued to the said State by the United States under the provisions of existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 2, line 9, after the word "schools," to insert:

Nor shall any property be so loaned when the loan would interfere with the use of the property for the purpose for which it has been issued or shall have been issued to the State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the governor of any State to loan to military colleges and schools within his State such tents and camp equipage as have been issued or shall be issued to the State by the United States under the provisions of existing law."

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

The resolution (S. Res. 293) to amend Rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over.

MAJ. WILLIAM O. OWEN.

The bill (S. 5525) restoring Maj. William O. Owen to the active list of the Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That, subject to the examination required by law, regulations, and orders for promotion from the grade of major to that of lieutenant colonel in the Medical Corps of the Army, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Maj. William O. Owen, United States Army, retired, a colonel in the Medical Corps on the active list of the Army, with the same rank and relative position he would now hold if he had not been retired, the number of officers in the grade of colonel in the Medical Corps of the Army to be temporarily increased by one during the time that he shall occupy an office in that grade and corps on the active list.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the President to appoint Maj. William O. Owen, United States Army, retired, a colonel on the active list of the Army."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the report on the bill which has just been passed is very short, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

The report, which was submitted by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN on July 30, 1914, is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, having had under consideration Senate bill 5525, restoring Maj. W. O. Owen to the active list of the Army, recommends that the bill be amended to read as follows:

"A bill to authorize the President to appoint Maj. William O. Owen, United States Army, retired, a colonel on the active list of the Army.

"Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to the examination required by law, regulations, and orders for promotion from the grade of major to that of lieutenant colonel in the Medical Corps of the Army, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Maj. William O. Owen, United States Army, retired, a colonel in the Medical Corps, on the active list of the Army, with the same rank and relative position he would now hold if he had not been retired, the number of officers in the grade of colonel in the Medical Corps of the Army to be temporarily increased by one during the time that he shall occupy an office in that grade and corps on the active list."

And as thus amended that it pass.

Maj. Owen was appointed assistant surgeon May 23, 1882, promoted to captain and assistant surgeon May 23, 1887, and to major and surgeon February 1, 1900. He was retired as major November 23, 1905, upon the findings of an examining board of Army surgeons that he was "incapacitated for active service, and that the cause of said incapacity is fusiform aneurism of the ascending arch of the aorta and neurasthenia; * * * that said incapacity is an incident of the service; * * * that said incapacity is permanent; * * * the date of the origin of disability being about December, 1902."

This officer has submitted the certificates of 10 well-known physicians of Washington and Baltimore, 2 of whom are X-ray specialists. All of these physicians unite in the belief that Maj. Owen was at the time of examination (April and May, 1914) in excellent physical health.

Attention is called to a statement in the report of Surg. Gen. Gorgas, as follows:

"If a man has been retired for physical disability, due to aneurism of aorta, and it afterwards turns out that this was a mistake, and in the course of time he entirely recovers his health, then it is manifestly for the advantage of the Government to have this man on the active list rather than on the retired."

The committee is of the belief that Maj. Owen was retired upon a mistaken diagnosis. The bill recommended by the committee was drawn by the Judge Advocate General of the Army, as submitted to the committee by the Secretary of War and the Surgeon General of the Army, and your committee believes, should Maj. Owen prove his competency under the examination therein provided for, that the best interests of the United States will be served by restoring him to the active list of the Army.

CHARLES A. COULSON.

The bill (H. R. 13698) to correct the military record of Charles A. Coulson was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] reported this bill. I notice that in the report there is no reason given why the bill should be passed. There is nothing before the Senate to justify its passage, and if the Senator from Montana is not in the Chamber, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BUILDING.

The bill (S. 6059) to provide for the erection, furnishing, and equipping of a building in the city of Washington, D. C., for the Department of Justice was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds if there was not a prior bill passed providing for the construction of this building and the selection of an architect to prepare plans; and also if that architect has not prepared such plans for the building?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Ohio that a bill was passed authorizing the expenditure of $8,000,000 for the construction of a building for the Departments of Commerce, of State, and of Justice, and that $200,000 was appropriated for plans and specifications.

In pursuance of the statute, which authorized the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into no contract further than for the plans and specifications, an advertisement was published, but in publishing the advertisement for plans and specifications the Secretary of the Treasury went further, and an architect was selected to prepare plans and specifications as authorized by the law. The contract with the architect went further, and provided that if Congress should authorize it, the architect should be employed to supervise the building, and he was to receive, I think, a compensation not exceeding 5 or 6 per cent of the cost of the building. The Secretary of the Treasury had no authority whatever to make any such agreement. It was not included in the authorization, which limits the expenditures to $200,000, which was about 2½ per cent of the appropriation made of $2,000,000 for the building for the Department of Justice. The plans of an architect of New York were accepted, and some modifications were to be made. The architect has been paid $19,000 for those plans, and the contract, if that were accepted, I think authorized him to get $48,000.

Congress never made any further authorization and the matter has been delayed from year to year until finally this bill was introduced. It was drawn by the department, and I have here a letter and memorandum from the department regarding it.

Mr. BURTON. Before that is read, I dislike to object to this bill, but I have received a protest against what I take it is an identical bill in the House of Representatives from a chapter or chapters of architects in my own State, and I must ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator that, unless the bill is acted on speedily, it will be almost impossible to pass it at this session of Congress. It is a most urgent matter, and the department has been trying for years to secure the construction of this building.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to examine the matter somewhat further.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, so that the Senator may have full and complete information on this subject, which I presume is what he wants, I will ask to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Department, together with copies of contracts, the statute, and other documents pertaining to this matter. Then the Senator can very quickly find accessible the information he desires for use when this bill comes up again, which I hope will be soon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 29, 1914.

Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with your personal request, I am transmitting herewith certain papers relating to the proposed building for the Department of Justice. With these I inclose a memorandum which I have had prepared reviewing the entire history of this project. I thought that perhaps your committee might desire to submit a more or less complete report with the bill for the Department of Justice Building in case you act favorably upon it, and believe that the accompanying memorandum gives you all necessary facts.

Very respectfully,

BYRON R. NEWTON,
Assistant Secretary.

Memorandum re Department of Justice.

JULY 29, 1914.

The original authorization for the proposed new buildings for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor will be found in section 31 of the public-building act (Public, 265) approved June 25, 1910. A copy of this section is attached.

The legislation referred to directs the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare designs and estimates for a separate fireproof building for each department; it fixes a total limit of cost for the three buildings of not to exceed $8,000,000; it authorizes an expenditure of not to exceed $200,000 for the preparation of designs and estimates; it authorizes the employment of expert services to assist in the preparation of designs and estimates; but it specifically states that the act does not authorize the appropriation of any part of the limit of cost of $8,000,000 except the sum of $200,000 for the purpose of obtaining designs and estimates.

The preceding section of the same act authorizes the construction of the new Washington post office. This section provides for the securing of expert services to assist in the preparation of designs, plans, drawings, specifications, and estimates, and the changes and modifications thereof, for the post-office building and its mechanical equipment, machinery, and mechanical mail-handling devices, lighting system, fixtures, and vaults.

The sum of $200,000, authorized to be appropriated for the preparation of designs and estimates for the three proposed department buildings is 2½ per cent of the limit of cost of $8,000,000. The preceding section, authorizing the construction of the Washington post office, places a limit of 4 per cent of the cost of the building for the employment of the qualified persons to assist in the preparation of the plans, designs, etc., previously described in detail.

The section authorizing the Washington post office does not authorize the employment of any persons outside the regular force in the Office of the Supervising Architect for supervising the construction of the building. The usual fee of 5 per cent or 6 per cent to an architect includes the supervision of the work. This explains the fact that for the Washington post office an expenditure of not to exceed 4 per cent was authorized for all necessary services, exclusive of supervision.

The two sections of the act referred to above may be read together in any attempt to reach a conclusion concerning the intention of the committee which framed the act and the intention of Congress in passing it. The legislation for the post-office building provides for all of the necessary designs, plans, drawings, specifications, estimates, etc., which would be required in connection with the actual construction of the building and fixes a limit of cost for these services which is in accordance with recognized practice. The legislation for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor restricts the authority given the Secretary of the Treasury to the preparation of designs and estimates only, and fixes a less limit of cost for this portion of the service than fixed in the preceding section for a much fuller service.

There is no doubt but that in the case of the three new department buildings Congress intended that the Secretary of the Treasury should merely prepare preliminary designs and estimates, in order to submit them to Congress as showing the accommodations which could be provided for each building within the total limit of cost of $8,000,000.

The legislation for the three department buildings did not segregate the total limit of cost of $8,000,000; it did not give the Secretary of the Treasury any authority to segregate that total in such a manner that it would be binding upon Congress in the event of actually authorizing the construction of any one or all of the buildings; it did not authorize the employment of services for the preparation of all of the drawings, specifications, etc., which would be required in connection with the actual construction of the building, and which were authorized for the Washington post office; it did not authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts for any services other than those necessary for the preparation of designs and estimates; it did not authorize him to enter into any contracts for the supervision of the work; and it did not authorize him to enter into any contracts for the actual construction of any one or all of the buildings.

In October, 1910, the competition was held among architects for the buildings for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, presumably in accordance with section 31 of the act referred to. The program, of which a copy is attached, states that the competition is for the selection of an architect. It states that the competition is to be in accordance with the act approved June 25, 1910; that it is one of three competitions which will be held simultaneously for the selection of three architects, to whom the erection of the three buildings for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor will be awarded. It states that the selection of one of the designs by the Secretary of the Treasury, and its subsequent approval, shall be final and conclusive. It refers in several places to the architect to whom the commission is awarded. It states that the architect, or architects, to whom said commission shall be awarded will receive in compensation, for full professional service, including local supervision of the building, a fee computed at the rate of 6 per cent upon the cost of the work executed from his drawings and specifications and under his superintendence. It provides for the payment of one-fifth of the fee when preliminary drawings are completed and approved. It stipulates that the architects shall provide for the use of the Treasury Department one set of tracings of all working drawings, one copy of the specifications, and one copy of detailed estimate of costs of the entire building, and provides that the architects shall furnish all other detail and full-size drawings and sketches necessary for the use of contractors during the construction.

It will be noted that the program provides for services far in excess of those authorized in the public building act, and far in excess of those for which the Secretary of the Treasury could make any legal contract.

The competition referred to was duly held, and, as a result, the award was made to Mr. Donn Barber, architect, of New York. A contract was entered into with Mr. Barber, of which a copy is inclosed.

This contract refers to the act approved June 25, 1910, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare designs and estimates. It states that the Secretary of the Treasury desires to secure the services of Donn Barber, architect, to prepare such designs and estimates for the building for the Department of Justice. It then states that Mr. Barber shall render all the services required in the preparation of sketches, estimates, and complete scale-working drawings, and changes therein required to be made, but exclusive of specifications, full-size detail drawings and large-scale drawings, local supervision of the construction, and the preparation of assignment plans. It provides that Mr. Barber shall be paid a fee of $48,579.64 for the services required, and it further agrees that, should Congress hereafter grant the necessary authority, a supplemental contract will be entered into with Mr. Barber for the further services required in the erection and completion of the said building, but the total fee to be paid under the original and supplemental contract is not to exceed 6 per cent of the actual construction cost of said building.

The limit of cost of $8,000,000 was divided between the three buildings by the Treasury Department as follows:

Department of Commerce and Labor	$3,650,000
Department of State	2,100,000
Department of Justice	2,000,000
Contingencies	250,000
Total	8,000,000

A fee of 2½ per cent upon the allotment of $2,000,000 for the Department of Justice would be $50,000. Mr. Barber's contract calls for $48,579.64, that being 2 per cent of $2,000,000, less his commission, as he was not entitled to a percentage on his own fee.

Upon the award of the competition, Mr. Barber revised his designs, and the same were forthwith approved. He was then paid, September 5, 1911, $19,431.85, approximately 1 per cent upon the tentative limit of cost of $2,000,000.

No further fee has been paid to Mr. Barber, and he has had no instructions to proceed with the preparation of scale details or other supplemental drawings.

A review of the entire situation by the Treasury Department late in the year 1912 developed the fact that the program for the competition for the selection of an architect for each of the three buildings and the subsequent contract entered into with each of the three architects greatly exceeded any legislative authority.

It is recognized in the architectural profession that for a building the size of any one of these three department buildings a fee of 1 per cent would be a fair remuneration for the preparation of designs or preliminary studies and estimates. Mr. Barber, as well as the architects selected for the two other buildings, has therefore been paid all that may be paid him without exceeding the authority conveyed in the act. Should any further payments have been made, they would not have been legal, and it would have been probably necessary to require each architect to refund the excess amounts.

Any contract entered into by an official of the Government on behalf of the United States is void in so far as it calls for services in excess of that provided for in any legislation existing at the time the contract was drawn. The contract with Mr. Barber and those with the architects selected for the two other buildings are therefore valid contracts only in so far as the provisions covering the preparation of designs and estimates and the making of payment therefor. Any agreement between the then Secretary of the Treasury and any one of these architects to enter into a supplemental contract was without authority and not binding upon the United States. Its value is merely that which lies in the expression of a desire to continue the services of a contractor in the event that Congress grants the necessary authority.

The bill H. R. 13870, Sixty-third Congress, second session, introduced by Hon. FRANK CLARK, of Florida, of which a copy is attached, authorizes the construction of a building for the Department of Justice and authorizes the obtaining of the necessary designs, plans, estimates, specifications, etc., either through competition among architects or from an architect to be specially selected.

Had the act of June 25, 1910, actually authorized the construction of a building for the Department of Justice or had it actually authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to select an architect and enter into a contract for all the professional services necessarily incident to the construction of the building, either with or without local supervision, it would not only be unnecessary to now introduce a bill for the same objects but such a procedure would be absurd. The mere fact that it is necessary to pass subsequent legislation in order to either obtain the necessary architectural services or contract for the erection of the building would appear to be sufficient evidence that the original legislation was incomplete in those respects.

The proposed legislation (H. R. 13870) does not prevent the recognition of Mr. Barber's undoubted moral claim to consideration. The fact that the bill expressly carries discretionary power to select an architect would permit of the employment of Mr. Barber. The attached copy of a letter of June 8, 1914, to Senator CHAMBERLAIN from the Secretary of the Treasury states explicitly that the proposed legislation permits of the employment of Mr. Barber, that nothing it contains would prevent the acknowledgment of his claim, and that the department would, in the event of the passage of the legislation, give him every consideration.

It has been shown that the act of 1910 did not contain authority to contract with Mr. Barber for the full professional service. It would manifestly be against considerations of good administration to pass an act of Congress requiring an officer of the Government to employ any person for the execution of any piece of work if the officer had not previous authority to enter into an agreement which would be binding upon the person to be employed. Should the bill H. R. 13870 be amended so as to make the employment of Mr. Barber mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury, then the latter could be placed in a position by the former which would make it impossible to agree upon whatever terms the latter might consider to be in the interest of the United States. It is not believed that Congress would desire to place an executive officer of the Government in such an anomalous position. It is not intimated and it is not believed that under the conditions Mr. Barber would take advantage of the situation. Nevertheless, it is not believed that such a form of procedure would, for the reason stated, be one that could be recommended. It is only necessary to consider the situation in which the Secretary of the Treasury would be placed should an act of Congress be approved requiring him to enter into a contract with a particular contractor for the erection of a public building in the absence of any prior authority to make any agreement with the contractor regarding the cost of the work, terms of payment, etc.

There is attached a copy of a letter addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds under date of July 1, 1914, which discusses more briefly the subject matter of this memorandum.

SEC. 30. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enter into contracts for the erection and completion of a suitable fireproof building or buildings for a post office and other purposes of the Postal Service, on square No. 678, now owned by the United States, in the city of Washington, D. C.

That the building or buildings shall be constructed on plans and estimates to be approved by a board to consist of the President, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be so constructed as to cost, complete, with approaches, heating apparatus, mechanical equipment, machinery and mechanical appliances for handling mail, vaults, etc., not to exceed the sum of $3,000,000, and of this authorization there shall be available an amount not to exceed $200,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby further authorized, without regard to civil-service laws, rules, or regulations, to secure such special architectural, engineering, or other expert technical services as he may deem necessary and specially order in writing, to serve either within or without the District of Columbia, to assist in the preparation of the designs, plans, drawings, specifications, and estimates, and the changes and modifications thereof, for said building or buildings and the mechanical equipment, machinery and mechanical appliances for handling mail, lighting system and fixtures, and vaults, and to pay for such services at such prices or rates of compensation as he may consider just and reasonable, from the appropriation for said building or buildings, any statute to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That expenditures under the foregoing authorization for securing specially qualified persons to assist the Secretary of the Treasury, together with any expenditures heretofore made for plans, designs, etc., for said building or buildings, shall not exceed in the aggregate 4 per cent of the limit of cost of said building or buildings, and shall be in addition to and independent of the authorizations and appropriations for personal services for the Office of the Supervising Architect otherwise made: Provided further, That the building or buildings shall be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury as other public buildings are constructed.

SEC. 31. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare designs and estimates for a separate fireproof building for each of the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, to be erected upon land acquired for sites thereof in the city of Washington, D. C., at a total limit of cost not to exceed $8,000,000; but no part of this amount is authorized to be appropriated by this act except as hereinafter provided. Such designs and estimates shall be approved by a board consisting of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the head of the respective executive department for the use of which such building is to be constructed, and an appropriation is hereby authorized for carrying out the purposes of this section of not to exceed $200,000.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, further authorized, without regard to civil-service laws, rules, or regulations, to secure such special architectural, engineering, or other expert technical services as he may deem necessary and specially order in writing, to serve either within or without the District of Columbia, to assist in the preparation of designs and estimates, and to pay for such services at such prices or rates of compensation as he may consider just and reasonable from the appropriation herein authorized, any statute to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That the foregoing authorization for securing the services of specially qualified persons shall be in addition to and independent of the authorizations and appropriations for personal services for the Office of the Supervising Architect otherwise made.

PROGRAM OF A COMPETITION FOR THE SELECTION OF AN ARCHITECT FOR A BUILDING FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE IN COMPLIANCE WITH THE ACT APPROVED JUNE 25, 1910, AND UNDER THE FOLLOWING REGULATIONS APPROVED BY THE PRESIDENT, THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

GENERAL CONDITIONS.

This competition is one of three which will be instituted simultaneously for the selection of three architects, to whom the erection of the three buildings for the Department of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor will be awarded.

It must be understood therefore that the evidence of ability of one designer to work in harmony with the successful competitors for the other buildings will be taken into consideration in making the award, and that while each successful competitor will be free to carry out his design it is an essential part of this program that the designers of the three buildings shall cooperate to the fullest extent in order that the three buildings, as a group, shall form a harmonious composition. The designs shall be modified and studied together until satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom the result of the joint study of the designs of the three successful architects must be submitted.

The accepted designs will then be presented to the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General for approval.

The following suggestions of the National Fine Arts Commission are quoted for the information of the competitors:

"It is, in our opinion, important that the buildings for the Department of Justice and the Department of State be placed at either end of the composition and that the building for the Department of Commerce and Labor be placed between them, but we do not consider it a matter of artistic importance which one of the end buildings be placed on Pennsylvania Avenue. We think that the northern elevation of the building on Pennsylvania Avenue should be parallel with the existing municipal building or normal to Fifteenth Street; that it should be somewhat in advance of the municipal building façade, but not enough to diminish greatly the irregular space which we recommend to be left open between the building and Pennsylvania Avenue. We recommend that the two end buildings be elevated on terraces, both because of the existing grades and because of the character which it is desirable to give to these buildings; that the Fifteenth Street façade of the central building should be placed farther back from the street line than the two end buildings and that the central axis on this street need not coincide with that of the ellipse in the White Lot, since the latter area can be at some future time modified in design. Further, we think that the building farthest south should occupy a position as nearly as possible parallel with the National Museum."

The accompanying plat shows the suggested location of the several buildings as decided on for the purpose of this competition.

COMMISSION OF AWARD.

1. A commission of award will be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, which shall judge and report to him as to the relative merit of the designs submitted.

No member of the commission shall have any interest whatever in any design submitted in the competition or any association with or employment by any of the competitors, and no employee of the Treasury Department shall be eligible to enter the competition or to assist any competitor in any manner.

FINDING OF COMMISSION.

2. The commission of award shall reject any set of drawings as to which the conditions of these regulations have not been observed and shall examine the remaining designs, giving to each the rank to which, in their judgment, its merit entitles it, and submit their findings to the Secretary of the Treasury in the form of a written report.

OPENING OF DRAWINGS.

3. Upon opening the packages containing the drawings, the commission will number the envelope containing the name and address of the competitor and will place the same number upon each drawing, description, etc., submitted by him, and will preserve unopened the envelope containing such name and address until final selection shall be made.

FINAL SELECTION.

4. The selection of one of the designs by the Secretary of the Treasury and its subsequent approval by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the head of the executive department to occupy the building shall be final and conclusive.

DATA FURNISHED.

5. The data on which the plan and design shall be based and the information as to cost and general requirements of the building is attached hereto, and the successful competitor will be designated to prepare complete drawings and specifications and to locally supervise the erection of the building.

COMPETITIVE DRAWINGS.

6. Each set of drawings, with its accompanying description, must be securely wrapped and sealed and addressed to the "Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.," plainly and conspicuously marked with the name of the building under competition, and without any distinguishing mark or device which might disclose the identity of the competitor.

There must be inclosed with each set of drawings, etc., a plain, white, opaque envelope, within which the competitor will place a card bearing his name and address. The envelope must be securely sealed with a plain wax seal having no impression, legend, device, or mark upon it which might disclose the identity of the competitor.

MISCONDUCT.

7. It must be understood that a competitor will forfeit all privileges under these regulations who shall violate any of the conditions governing this competition, or who shall seek in any way, directly or indirectly, to gain advantage by influencing in his favor any member of the commission of award.

REJECTED DESIGNS.

8. The department agrees to make selection from the designs submitted if, in its opinion, one suitable in all respects as to design, detail, and cost be submitted, but expressly reserves the right to reject any and all plans, designs, etc., submitted, and to reopen the competition if, in the opinion of the commission herein referred to, or of the Secretary of the Treasury, no design suitable in all respects has been submitted.

UNSUCCESSFUL COMPETITORS.

9. It must be understood that no claim shall be made upon the United States by any unsuccessful competitor for any fee, percentage, or payment whatever, or any expense incident to, or growing out of, his participation in the competition, other than herein stated.

SUCCESSFUL COMPETITOR MAY BE REJECTED.

10. In the event that the architect to whom the commission is awarded should prove to be an incompetent or improper person, the Secretary of the Treasury expressly reserves the right to remove him, to revoke the commission awarded him, and to annul the contract entered into with him; but such architect shall receive equitable compensation for the work properly performed by him up to the time of his removal, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

RETURN OF COMPETITIVE DRAWINGS.

11. Upon the award of the commission to the architect, all designs of unsuccessful competitors will be returned to them, and no use will be made of any of the drawings not accepted, or of any part that may be original, without the consent of the author thereof.

DRAWINGS AFTER AWARD.

12. The architect to whom the commission is awarded shall revise his competitive drawings to meet the further requirements of the Secretary of the Treasury and the officials of the department to occupy the building, and upon the basis of these revised preliminary drawings shall prepare full detailed working drawings and specifications for said building; and shall thereafter, from time to time, make such changes in the drawings and specifications as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for which just compensation shall be allowed; but no changes in the drawings and specifications shall be made without written authority from the Secretary of the Treasury.

ARCHITECT'S FEE.

13. The architect (or architects) to whom said commission shall be awarded will receive in compensation for full professional services, including local supervision of the building, a fee computed at the rate of 6 per cent upon the cost of the work executed from his drawings and specifications and under his superintendence. The sum upon which the architect's commission is to be computed shall be the actual construction cost of the building as ascertained from the net amount of contracts awarded and proposals accepted for additions or deductions.

The architect's commission shall be paid as the work progresses in the following order:

One-fifth of fee when preliminary drawings are completed and approved in the manner herein provided; three-tenths of fee when general working drawings and specifications are completed and copies delivered to the Supervising Architect; and balance of percentage monthly upon the basis of payments for work performed as of record on the books of the Office of the Supervising Architect.

Until the actual cost of the building can be determined the fee of the architect will be based upon the proposed cost of the work as above indicated, or as may be readjusted from time to time, and will be paid as installments of the entire fee.

The compensation herein stipulated to be paid to said architect shall be in full payment of all charges for his full services, inclusive of all traveling and other expenses necessary to his proper superintendence of the work. Expenses incurred in traveling under orders from the department may be reimbursed on approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Alterations in the working drawings and specifications which may be necessary to keep the cost of the building within the limit furnished by the Office of the Supervising Architect shall, when required by the Secretary of the Treasury, be made by the architect in charge at his own cost.

The architect is to provide for the use of the Treasury Department one set of tracings of all working drawings, one copy of the specifications, and one copy of detailed estimate of cost of entire building, which, with the competitive drawings or revised competitive drawings as may be necessary, shall remain in the custody of the department, and to be and remain the property of the United States and not of the architect; but such drawings and specifications shall not be used for any other building. The Office of the Supervising Architect will furnish for the use of intending bidders all necessary duplication of general working drawings and specifications. All other detail and all full-size drawings and sketches necessary for the use of contractors during construction must be furnished by the architect and copies supplied by him both to the contractors and the Government superintendent of construction at the building. The architect shall furnish the superintendent of construction with copies of all letters addressed by him to the contractors relative to the work.

GOVERNMENT SUPERINTENDENT OF CONSTRUCTION.

14. The department will appoint and maintain on the work as its local representative a superintendent of construction. This officer will act under orders from the department and solely as its representative, and not at all as the representative of the architect in charge, who will not be relieved in any particular from his responsibilities for the actual superintendence of the work by the superintendent of construction. The last-named official will not give orders to contractors or their employees.

ARCHITECT'S CERTIFICATE OF WORK DONE.

15. Payments upon the work of construction under contract will be made upon vouchers certified by the architect in charge and countersigned by the "superintendent of construction" representing the United States Government, which will be paid by a disbursing officer appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

CONTRACTS FOR CONSTRUCTION.

16. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department will receive the proposals for contracts to be awarded, and shall likewise determine the manner in which the various branches of the work are to be contracted for.

All further details necessary to properly carry out these regulations may be arranged by the Supervising Architect from time to time, provided they do not conflict herewith.

CONDITIONS SPECIAL TO THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

17. The invitation to enter this competition is personal to the architect invited, and the competitive drawings submitted are to be prepared by the competitor in his own office, and without assistance other than the usual force of his office. The invitation is not transferable to a new partnership including an architect not invited by the department without the assent of the department first being obtained.

The cost of the building must be kept within $1,900,000, and is to include the plumbing and gas piping, electric conduits and wiring, heating and ventilating apparatus, generating plants for heat, light, and power, elevators, approaches, lighting fixtures, both gas and electric, mural painting and commissions of architects—everything, in fact, necessary to the completion of the building ready for occupancy, furniture only excepted.

Special attention is called to the above stated limit of cost, and drawings presented which can not be estimated within the stated limit at the rate of 46 cents per cubic foot, reckoned from the floor level of the lowest story of the building, will be placed out of consideration.

The building must be of fireproof construction, the exterior to be of such material as each competitor deems best suited for the execution of his design, and the interior to be finished generally in the same manner as a first-class office building, with such special finish of the more important rooms as the designer may consider advisable or required.

The site of the building is shown by the plat hereto attached. The north front will be especially important, and the treatment of the several fronts and the arrangement of entrances is left to the discretion of the competing architects, according to the arrangement of the interior devised by them. The height of the exterior order shall be between 47 and 50 feet, including columns and entablature. The approximate height of the stories is to be as follows:

Basement	12′ 0″ in the clear.
First floor	14′ 6″ in the clear.
Second floor	12′ 6″ in the clear.
Third floor	12′ 6″ in the clear.

The following statement furnishes approximate information as to the accommodations required:

The ground area of the building is to be about 57,600 square feet, exclusive of any light courts to be provided. The necessary space is to be arranged to receive the heating and power plant, etc.

GENERAL STATEMENT OF ACCOMMODATIONS REQUIRED.

18. The purpose of an architectural competition being not to secure fully developed plans but such evidence of skill in directing the essential elements of a preliminary as will assist in the selection of an architect, the drawings required have been limited as given below:

Each design shall consist of the following drawings only, at a scale of one-sixteenth inch to 1 foot (no alternate design will be considered), and shall be inclosed in a portfolio or between stiff cardboard. They shall be securely wrapped, sealed, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, Office of the Supervising Architect, Washington, D. C., plainly and conspicuously marked with the name of the building under competition, and with no other marks whatever.

(1) Plan of the first floor, showing location of building on the lot. This drawing to be rendered in india ink, sections blacked in, but no elaborate tiling, furniture, etc., shown.

(2) Plan of the second floor.

(3) Plan of the third floor.

(5) Block section.

(6) Outline sketch elevation of one other front, with no brushwork or shading.

The plans of the second and third floors, the block section, and the outline elevation may be in pencil on tracing paper, if preferred. No perspective sketch will be received.

Tracings must be attached to white paper, and drawings other than those on tracing paper must be on white drawing paper, unmounted, and of a size to allow approximately 4 inches of clear paper on all sides of the drawing proper. It is desired to have all sheets of any one competitor of uniform size.

Two drawings may be on one sheet, if desired.

Drawings to be titled "Competition for building for Department of Justice," with only such other words or figures as may be necessary to designate their parts, etc.

All words and figures to be simple lettering and not script or writing.

Inquiries for additional information must be made in writing only and forwarded by mail to the Office of the Supervising Architect, and any replies made will be simultaneously communicated by mail to each competitor by circular letter; but no information will be given after November 30, 1910.

Designs must be delivered at the Office of the Supervising Architect, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C., not later than 2 o'clock p. m., December 30, 1910.

A brief description of the building, typewritten on plain legal cap, calling attention to any special points of the design, materials proposed, etc., must accompany the drawings.

An estimate of the cost must also be forwarded with this description and be in the following form:

Cubic contents of building _____ feet.

Exterior surface (gross) of all stonework _____ square feet.

Estimated amount of contracts of all work necessary to complete the building $_____.

CONTRACT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND DONN BARBER.

Whereas the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare designs and estimates for a separate fireproof building for each of the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, etc., and to secure such special architectural, engineering, or other expert technical services as he may deem necessary etc.; and

Whereas, acting under said authorization, the Secretary of the Treasury desires to secure the services of Donn Barber, architect, to prepare such designs and estimates for the building for the Department of Justice:

Now, therefore, this agreement made and entered into by and between Franklin MacVeagh, Secretary of the Treasury, for and in behalf of the United States of America, of the first part, and Donn Barber, of New York, N. Y., of the second part, witnesseth: That the party of the second part, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, covenants and agrees to and with the party of the first part to render all the services required in the preparation of sketches, estimates, and complete scale working drawings and the changes therein required to be made (but exclusive of all specifications, full-size detailed drawings and large scale drawings in connection therewith, local supervision of the construction of the building, and the assignment plans therefor) in connection with the new building in Washington, D. C., for the Department of Justice hereinbefore referred to, in strict and full accordance with the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, including all engineering or other expert services necessary to enable said party of the second part to furnish said sketches, estimates, and scale working drawings, complete, to the satisfaction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department.

And the party of the second part further covenants and agrees to revise the approved designs and estimates to meet the further requirements of the Secretary of the Treasury, if called upon to do so, and to prepare complete scale working drawings necessary, in the judgment of the Supervising Architect, for said building; and thereafter, from time to time, to make such changes in the drawings, etc., as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and to make such revisions and alterations of the scale working drawings, as may be necessary, in the judgment of said Supervising Architect, to make them harmonize with those for the other buildings included in the group hereinbefore enumerated, and to insure that the building can be constructed, complete, within the limit of cost therefor as furnished by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department; but no change in the scale working drawings as approved shall be made without written authority therefor from the Secretary of the Treasury.

And the party of the second part further covenants and agrees to provide, without extra cost to the United States, one set of tracings of all scale working drawings and one copy of the detailed estimate of cost of the entire building; all of which, together with the approved competition sketches, shall remain in the custody of the Treasury Department and be and remain the property of the party of the first part.

And the party of the first part covenants and agrees to pay, or cause to be paid, unto said party of the second party, or the heirs, executors, or administrators of the said party of the second part, a fee of $48,579.64.

And the party of the first part covenants and agrees that payments shall be made in the following manner, viz, two-fifths of the fee when the sketches and estimates are completed and approved, and the balance of the fee when the scale working drawings are completed and approved and copies thereof delivered to said Supervising Architect, a portion of such final payment being subject, however, to the appropriation by Congress of the remaining $40,000 of the authorization of $200,000 for designs and estimates.

And it is further covenanted and agreed by the parties hereto that the payments herein stipulated to be made by the party of the first part shall be in full compensation and payment of all charges for the full services of the party of the second part in the preparation of all sketches, estimates, and scale working drawings, and changes therein, and for all traveling, subsistence, contingent, and other expenses of the said party of the second part; but any travel required of the party of the second part by the party of the first part for its own purposes, and specially ordered, shall be at the expense of the party of the first part.

And it is further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that in case the party of the second part from any cause becomes unable to complete the foregoing contract, or if the conduct of the said party of the second part is such that the interests of the United States are thereby likely to be placed in jeopardy, or if the said party of the second part violates any of the conditions or stipulations of this contract, the said Secretary of the Treasury, acting for and in behalf of the party of the first part, shall have the right to revoke this contract and to complete or cause to be completed this contract, using for that purpose all sketches, estimates, and scale working drawings, etc., which may have been prepared by the party of the second part; provided, in such case, however, that the party of the second part shall receive equitable compensation for all service properly performed under this contract up to the date of its revocation, such compensation to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the basis of the percentages herein provided for.

It is further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that, in the event that Congress shall hereafter grant the necessary authority therefor, they will enter into a contract supplemental hereto for the further architectural services of said party of the second part in connection with the erection and completion of said building to such an extent as Congress may authorize; but the total fee to be paid hereunder and under said proposed supplemental contract shall not exceed 6 per cent of the actual construction cost of said building as shown upon the books of the Supervising Architect's Office.

It is an express condition of this contract that no Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, or other person whose name is not at this time disclosed, shall be admitted to any share in this contract, or to any benefit to arise therefrom; and it is further covenanted and agreed that this contract shall not be assigned.

In testimony whereof the parties hereto have hereunto subscribed their names this 24th day of July, A. D. 1911.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 8, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of a letter addressed to you under date of May 20 by the secretary of the Oregon Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, which under date of June 1, you transmitted to the Supervising Architect with a request for information. This letter is one of several communications relative to the proposed legislation for the Department of Justice building which have been referred to the Treasury Department.

Inasmuch as the proposed legislation is not as yet a matter of law, and therefore no authority has been vested in the Treasury Department, any extended discussion of its various phases might be premature. Nevertheless I am glad to furnish you a statement of the facts.

Section 31 of the public-buildings act approved June 25, 1910 (Public, No. 265), authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare "designs and estimates" for a separate fireproof building for each of the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, at a total limit of cost not to exceed $8,000,000. The act authorized an expenditure of not to exceed $200,000 for this purpose, but did not authorize the construction of the buildings.

The then Supervising Architect, with the approval of the then Secretary of the Treasury, issued a program calling for a competition among architects for each of the three buildings. The program stated in each case that the competition would be for the selection of an architect. The program also stated that the architects selected for the three buildings would be retained and would furnish full professional services at a fee of 6 per cent upon the cost of the work.

The competitions were duly held, and an award made in each case. For the building for the Department of State Mr. Arnold W. Brunner, of New York, was selected. For the building for the Department of Justice Mr. Donn Barber, of New York, was selected. For the building for the Department of Commerce and Labor Messrs. York & Sawyer, of New York, were selected.

The then Secretary of the Treasury entered into a contract with each of the above architects for a certain portion of the professional service referred to in the competition program. This partial service included the preparation and revision of sketches, the preparation of working drawings and specifications, but not the preparation of full-size details nor the furnishing of local supervision, but agreed to enter into a subsequent contract for these, contingent upon Congress making the necessary authorizations.

It is greatly to be regretted that the then Supervising Architect and the then Secretary of the Treasury appear to have exceeded the authority contained in the legislation in connection with the holding of the competitions, the selection of architects, and entering into contracts with the latter.

Any contract entered into by a Government official on behalf of the United States which calls for services in excess of those authorized by law is automatically void to that extent. The legislation to which reference is made in the foregoing called for only the preparation of "designs and estimates." It carried no authority for the selection of an architect, no authority for the construction of the buildings, and no authority for entering into a contract for the full professional services. Had it done so, subsequent legislation would evidently have been unnecessary.

Messrs. Barber, Brunner, and York & Sawyer have each prepared the "designs and estimates" called for in the legislation and have been paid for their work. The requirements of the legislation would seem therefore to have been complied with. The department is now in the position of a private client who employs an architect to prepare sketches and estimates for a contemplated project. If the client pays the architect for these preliminary services, no further obligation exists. The suggestion that the present Secretary of the Treasury is repudiating a valid contract made by his predecessor is based upon erroneous premises and is without justification. To do so would render the United States liable for damages unless Congress, by legislation, was responsible for the act of repudiation. The proposed legislation for the building for the Department of Justice does not repudiate any existing contract for the very simple reason that no valid contract exists.

The legislation for the proposed building for the Department of Justice permits of the employment of Mr. Barber. The clause which it also contains, permitting of the employment of another architect, was inserted in order to give the commission created by the legislation a discretion which I believe it should have in the public interest.

In so far as this department is concerned the obligation of the department to Mr. Barber is a moral one. Nothing in the pending legislation prevents the acknowledgment of this claim, and the department would undoubtedly, in the event of the passage of the legislation, give Mr. Barber every consideration.

Your inclosure is returned herewith.

With expressions of high regard, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
House of Representatives, United States.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The introduction of H. R. 13870, a bill providing for the erection, under the direction of this department, of a new building for the Department of Justice, has been followed by numerous protests on the part of the architectural profession. These protests have generally taken the form of petitions from architectural bodies addressed to various Members of Congress. The gist of the petitions—or, at least, of such of them as have been referred to the Treasury Department—is that the legislation, through not definitely recognizing Mr. Donn Barber, of New York, as the architect, repudiates a contract already entered into with him. Because of the fact that these petitions appear to place the department, whether intentionally or not, in a somewhat unenviable position, it would seem that I should lay before you a statement of the facts as they appear from the department's records. This I am particularly anxious to undertake for the reason that the bill referred to was introduced by you at my request, and, of course, I would not desire that you should be made the target for any criticism.

The proposed legislation is, of course, not as yet a law, and no discretion is actually vested in the Treasury Department, so that the following statement must largely concern itself with prior developments.

I inclose a copy of section 31 of the public building act approved June 25, 1910. This legislation authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare "designs and estimates" for a separate fireproof building for each of the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor, at a total limit of cost not to exceed $8,000,000. The act authorized an expenditure of not to exceed $200,000 for this purpose, but did not authorize the construction of the buildings.

The then Supervising Architect, with the approval of the then Secretary of the Treasury, issued a program calling for a competition among architects for each of the three buildings. The program stated in each case that the competition would be for the selection of an architect. The program also stated that the architects selected for the three buildings would be retained and would furnish full professional services at a fee of 6 per cent upon the cost of the work.

The competitions were duly held, and an award made in each case. For the building for the Department of State Mr. Arnold W. Brunner, of New York, was selected. For the building for the Department of Justice Mr. Donn Barber, of New York, was selected. For the building for the Department of Commerce and Labor Messrs. York & Sawyer, of New York, were selected.

The then Secretary of the Treasury entered into a contract with each of the above architects for a certain portion of the professional service referred to in the competition program. This partial service included the preparation and revision of sketches, the preparation of working drawings and specifications, but not the preparation of full-size details nor the furnishing of local supervision, but agreed to enter into a subsequent contract for these, contingent upon Congress making the necessary authorizations.

It is greatly to be regretted that the then Supervising Architect and the then Secretary of the Treasury appear to have exceeded the authority contained in the legislation in connection with the holding of the competitions, the selection of architects, and entering into contracts with the latter.

Any contract entered into by a Government official on behalf of the United States which calls for services in excess of those authorized by law is automatically void to that extent. The legislation to which reference is made in the foregoing called for only the preparation of "designs and estimates." It carried no authority for the selection of an architect, no authority for the construction of the buildings, and no authority for entering into a contract for the full professional services. Had it done so, subsequent legislation would evidently have been unnecessary.

Messrs. Barber, Brunner, and York & Sawyer have each prepared the "designs and estimates" called for in the legislation, and have been paid for their work. The requirements of the legislation would seem, therefore, to have been complied with. The department is now in the position of a private client who employs an architect to prepare sketches and estimates for a contemplated project. If the client pays the architect for these preliminary services, no further obligation exists. The suggestion that the present Secretary of the Treasury is repudiating a valid contract made by his predecessor is based upon erroneous premises and is without justification. To do so would render the United States liable for damages, unless Congress, by legislation, was responsible for the act of repudiation. The proposed legislation for the building for the Department of Justice does not repudiate any existing contract, for the very simple reason that no valid contract exists.

This department, of course, has no intention, and could have no intention, of repudiating the existing contract with Mr. Barbet in so far as it is authorized by existing law; in fact, Mr. Barber has already furnished all of the services which were authorized. Any further obligation of the department to Mr. Barber is necessarily a moral one. Nothing in the pending legislation prevents the acknowledgment of this claim, and the department would undoubtedly, in the event of the passage of the legislation, give Mr. Barber every consideration.

With expressions of high regard, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if the Senate bill is identical with the House bill?

Mr. SWANSON. The two bills are identical. Similar bills were introduced in the House and in the Senate. The architect is antagonizing the passage of any bill, unless Congress will direct that the Secretary of the Treasury shall employ him. I want to say here and now that I will never consent that the action of a former Secretary of the Treasury, who was not authorized under the statute to employ an architect, shall bind all of his successors. I would never consent that this bill should pass if it compelled the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out a contract made by a former Secretary of the Treasury, who had no authority to make it.

Mr. BURTON. I have heard from no architect who is interested in the construction of this building. The protest which was sent to me was against the House bill; I was not aware that there was any such Senate bill. I answered the protest against the House bill by stating that I would give the measure attention if it should reach the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I received the same protest, and a copy, I presume, was sent to every Member of Congress.

Mr. BURTON. I must ask that the bill go over at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being objection, the bill goes over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

LIEUT. COL. JUNIUS L. POWELL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The bill (S. 784) to place Lieut. Col. Junius L. Powell on the retired list of the Army with the rank of brigadier general was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I will inquire who objected to that bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I objected. I have not had time to examine the matter, and I do not understand why we should raise an officer from the grade of lieutenant colonel to brigadier general, and place him on the retired list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator had examined the report he would find that there is every reason in the world for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will state the reason, I may withdraw the objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will turn to the report he will find the facts. I read from the report of the Secretary of War, which is embodied in the report submitted by the committee:

> Col. Powell is now the only officer on the rolls of the Regular Army who had service in the Confederate Army. The law of July 28, 1866, forbade the appointment in the United States Army of any person who had served in the Confederate Army. Col. Powell obtained a special act on January 29, 1879, authorizing an exception to be made in his case, under which he was appointed an assistant surgeon with the rank of first lieutenant. Since that time he has had about 30 years' continuous service on the active list of the Army, which includes service in the field during Indian campaigns and during the Spanish-American War.
> Gen. Joseph Wheeler had two years' service in the Regular Army and resigned to enter the Confederate Army. He had two years' service as a volunteer during the Spanish-American War and was made a brigadier general in the Regular Army three months before the date of his retirement with that grade. Gen. Fitzhugh Lee had about five years' service in the Regular Army when he resigned to enter the Confederate service. He served as a major general and brigadier general of volunteers from 1898 to 1901, when he was appointed a brigadier general upon the retired list of the Army by a special act of Congress.

What I have read you is a quotation from the report of the Secretary of War. I now read the recommendation of the committee:

> The committee having carefully considered the long and faithful service of Col. Powell, taken in connection with the precedents above cited, are of the opinion that he is entitled to be placed upon the retired list of the Army with the rank of a brigadier general.

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 784) to place Lieut. Col. Junius L. Powell on the retired list of the Army with the rank of brigadier general.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM WALTERS.

The bill (S. 1174) for the relief of William Walters, alias Joshua Brown, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

> That in the administration of the pension laws William Walters, alias Joshua Brown, who was a private of Battery M, First Regiment United States Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said battery and regiment on the 13th day of September, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLIVER C. RICE.

The bill (S. 5684) to correct the military record of Oliver C. Rice and to grant him an honorable discharge was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

> That in the administration of the pension laws Oliver C. Rice shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as a drummer of Company D, Nineteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, from the 7th day of August, 1861, to the 7th day of March, 1862, and to have been discharged honorably as a drummer of said company and regiment on the date last mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Oliver C. Rice."

SURVEY OF RIO GRANDE BORDER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) authorizing a survey and examination of the Rio Grande border of the United States to determine the advisability of constructing a highway either along the entire border or certain sections thereof was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I appeal to the Senator from Mississippi to allow this bill to be passed. It merely provides for an examination and survey, and if he knew the conditions on the border I do not believe he would object; they are exceptional. An examination and survey certainly are needed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I have received a request to ask that the bill go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MARY CORNICK.

The bill (H. R. 10460) for the relief of Mary Cornick was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mary Cornick, widow of Peter Cornick, $642.40 on account of the death of Peter Cornick on the 2d day of December, A. D. 1901, while employed in the steam engineering department at the navy yard at Norfolk, Va., through no negligence on his part, in the line of his duty; but no agent, attorney, firm of attorneys, or any persons engaged heretofore or hereafter in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting this claim shall directly or indirectly receive or retain for such service in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim, or for any act whatsoever in connection with this claim, any fee or compensation whatsoever.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARENCE L. GEORGE.

The bill (H. R. 14679) for the relief of Clarence L. George was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Clarence L. George, late a first-class private, Company H, of the Signal Corps of the Army, the sum of $296.03.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPARROW GRAVELY TOBACCO CO.

The bill (H. R. 13965) to refund to the Sparrow Gravely Tobacco Co. the sum of $176.90, the same having been erroneously paid by them to the Government of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WHALING IN ALASKAN WATERS.

The bill (S. 5283) to regulate the catching of whales in the waters of the Territory of Alaska was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANE. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] asked me to call attention to this bill and to state that he would like to have it passed to-day. He left with me a copy of a letter from the Department of Commerce addressed to the Hon. JOHN R. THORNTON, chairman of the Committee on Fisheries, in support of the bill. I inquire if the Senator from Oregon especially desires that the bill go over.

Mr. LANE. Yes. There are several members of the committee who wish it to go over, including the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], the chairman of the committee, the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STANDARDIZATION OF APPLE CONTAINERS.

The bill (S. 4517) to establish a standard box for apples, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures, with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, after the word "apples," to insert "hereinafter provided for"; so as to make the section read:

That the standard box for apples hereinafter provided for shall be of the following dimensions when measured without distention of its parts:

Depth of end, 10½ inches; width of end, 11½ inches; length of box, 18 inches; all inside measurements, and representing, as nearly as possible, 2,173½ cubic inches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 1, line 12, after the word "sale," to insert "in interstate or foreign commerce"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any box in which apples shall be packed and offered for sale in interstate or foreign commerce which does contain less than the required number of cubical inches, as prescribed in section 1 of this act, shall be plainly marked on one side and one end with the words "Short box," or with words or figures showing the fractional relation which the actual capacity of the box bears to the capacity of the box prescribed in section 1 of this act. The marking required by this paragraph shall be in block letters of the size not less than 72-point block Gothic.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 3, line 14, after the word "act," to insert "Provided, however, That all shipments in boxes to foreign countries in which a standard box may have been established may be marked 'For export, quality of contents equal to American standard,'" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That boxes containing apples marked "Standard" shall be deemed to be misbranded within the meaning of this act—

When the size of the box does not conform to the requirements of section 1 of this act, and when the markings on the box and the contents thereof do not conform to the requirements of sections 3 and 4 of this act: Provided, however, That all shipments in boxes to foreign countries in which a standard box may have been established may be marked "For export, quality of contents equal to American standard."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 3, line 21, after the word "apples," to insert "intended for interstate or foreign commerce," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That any person, firm, company, or organization who shall mark or cause to be marked boxes packed with apples intended for interstate or foreign commerce, or sell, or offer for sale, shipment, or delivery, in interstate or foreign commerce, apples in boxes contrary to the provisions of this act or in violation hereof, or shall sell or offer for sale or delivery in interstate or foreign commerce in a standard box apples other than those originally packed therein without first completely obliterating the original markings and labels on such box and mark the box to conform to the provisions of this act shall be liable to a penalty of $1 for each box so marked, sold, or offered for sale or delivery, and costs, to be recovered at the suit of the United States in any court having jurisdiction: Provided, That the penalty to be recovered on any one shipment shall not exceed the sum of $100, exclusive of costs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of section 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, after the word "inches," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the packing, shipment, or offering for sale of apples in boxes or containers whose dimensions do not comply with those hereinabove described.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. On page 4, line 12, I move to strike out "fourteen" and insert "fifteen." That will make the act take effect next July instead of last July.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Colorado what will be left of the bill with his amendment added to it?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, the bill is designed to establish a standard box, which may or may not be used. Those who desire to use it can do so by complying with the statute and obtain whatever advantage there may be in the use of a box of such dimensions. A good many of the apple raisers of my State, however, feel——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he will not allow that amendment to apply only to Colorado? We certainly would not like to have it apply to the State of Utah.

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to say that I think a careful reading of the bill will demonstrate that this amendment is superfluous. I offered it out of an abundance of caution. I think the bill, as drawn, is not mandatory; but I am perfectly willing to accept the suggestion of the Senator, and limit the operations of the amendment which I offered to the State of Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that would be very much better, because I have received letters from nearly all of the shippers of fruit in Utah, and what they want to insist upon is a uniform box, so that if anybody orders a box of apples it will be a uniform box of apples, from any grower or any part of the State; and I know that this is in conformity with their desire.

Mr. THOMAS. The only requirement of this bill is to provide that if a standard box is used it shall be stamped in a certain way. It does not inhibit the use of boxes of any other size, in my judgment.

Mr. JONES. If people want to send out apples marked "Standard," then they must conform to certain requirements.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. JONES. If they are not marked "Standard," they need not do so.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps other States would not——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to modify his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then, without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Senator from Colorado will now present it as modified.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Colorado proposes to modify the amendment so as to read "packing, shipping, or offering for sale apples grown in the State of Colorado," and so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce a joint resolution for proper reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The title of the joint resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 177) to transfer to the custody and possession of the Attorney General sealskins.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The SECRETARY. Also, a bill (S. 6271) for the relief of Marin Elizabeth Burnett.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call attention——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, can that be done under the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are now proceeding?

Mr. SMOOT. No business was to be done to-day other than the consideration of bills under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would not care to rule on that question. If there is objection, it could not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, of course we agreed that there should be no business transacted except the consideration of bills under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that that would apply only to legislative matters; but if there is objection, the Chair will hold that the objection is well taken.

WILLIAM H. SHANNON.

The bill (H. R. 962) for the relief of William H. Shannon was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LEMUEL H. REDD.

The bill (S. 1231) for the relief of Lemuel H. Redd was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of the pension laws Lemuel H. Redd shall hereafter be held and considered to have served as a private in Col. Stephen Markham's command, Utah Indian war: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or back pension shall accrue or become payable by virtue of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVIS SMITH.

The bill (H. R. 16205) for the relief of Davis Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to Davis Smith, of Wewela, Tripp County, S. Dak., for the northeast quarter of section No. 10 in township 95 north of range 76 west of the fifth principal meridian, South Dakota, regardless of the fact that said Davis Smith had commuted a former entry under the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States," approved June 15, 1880 (21 Stat., 237): Provided, That said Davis Smith make satisfactory proof of his compliance with the homestead law and pay the price per acre provided in the law under which he made homestead entry for the land described herein.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE, NEAR GUNTERSVILLE, ALA.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, referring to Order of Business No. 566, I withdraw my objection to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5977) to authorize Bryan and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes Bryan and Albert Henry, of Guntersville, Ala., and their assigns, when authorized by the State of Alabama, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Guntersville, Ala., said bridge to connect the mainland with Henry Island, in said Tennessee River, in the county of Marshall, in the State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and expressly reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE M. VAN LEUVEN.

The bill (H. R. 10765) granting a patent to George M. Van Leuven for the northeast quarter of section 18, township 17 north, range 19 east, Black Hills meridian, South Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George M. Van Leuven patent for the northeast quarter of section 18, township 17 north, range 19 east, Black Hills meridian, South Dakota, notwithstanding that his homestead entry therefor was invalid upon the ground that he had exhausted his homestead right through purchase of 160 acres of land under the provisions of section 2 of the act of June 15, 1880 (21 Stat. L., 237): Provided, That he shall first have shown compliance with the provisions of the homestead law and shall have made the required payments: Provided further, That there exists no valid adverse claim for said tract.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

T. A. ROSEBERRY.

The bill (H. R. 1528) for the relief of T. A. Roseberry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior, upon payment to the Government of the United States of the full sum of $1.25 per acre having first been made, to issue patent to T. A. Roseberry and his heirs for the land embraced in his timber-claim entry No. 147, being the west half of the northeast quarter and the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter section 20, township 39 north, range 9 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, in the Susanville land district in Modoc County, Cal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM L. WALLIS.

The bill (H. R. 17045) for the relief of William L. Wallis, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to William L. Wallis, of Ardmore, Fall River County, S. Dak., for the west one-half of the southeast quarter and the east one-half of the southwest quarter of section No. 35, in township 11 south, of range 2 east, of the Black Hills meridian, South Dakota, regardless of the fact that said William L. Wallis had commuted a former entry under the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States," approved June 15, 1880 (21 Stat., p. 237): Provided, That said William L. Wallis make satisfactory proof of his compliance with the homestead law and pay the price per acre provided in the law under which he made homestead entry for the land described herein.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. MILLER.

The bill (H. R. 16431) to validate the homestead entry of William H. Miller, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It validates the homestead entry of William H. Miller, No. 010224, made October 28, 1909, for the northwest quarter of section 29, township 20 north, range 49 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES BY FEMALE AMERICAN CITIZENS.

The bill (H. R. 11745) to provide for certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "alien," to insert "who is entitled to become a citizen of the United States," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any female citizen of the United States who has initiated a claim to a tract of public land under any of the laws applicable thereto, and who thereafter has complied with all the conditions as to the acquisition of title to such land prescribed by the public-land laws of the United States, shall, notwithstanding her intermarriage with an alien, who is entitled to become a citizen of the United States, be entitled to a certificate or patent to such entry equally as though she had remained unmarried or had married an American citizen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

The bill (S. 6120) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I make the same request as with reference to the other omnibus bill—that it be passed over temporarily.

Mr. BURTON. I dislike to object, but I think I shall have to object to either of those bills coming up to-day.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator does not make that statement now?

Mr. BURTON. Well, we will see when they are reached.

CAPT. ARMISTEAD RUST.

The bill (S. 1267) to transfer Capt. Armistead Rust from the retired to the active list of the United States Navy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "authorized," to insert "to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so as to read:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Armistead Rust, now a captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, to the active list of captains of the United States Navy, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THOMAS F. HOWELL.

The bill (H. R. 1516) for the relief of Thomas F. Howell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to reinstate the homestead entry No. 3944 of Thomas F. Howell, and to issue a patent to said Thomas F. Howell for the land embraced in his homestead entry No. 3944, Redding, Cal., for the southeast quarter of northeast quarter of section 6, south half of northwest quarter and southwest quarter of northeast quarter section 5, township 28 north, range 5 east, Mount Diablo meridian, upon submission of proof of residence upon and improvement and cultivation of said land as required by the homestead laws: Provided, That such final proof be submitted at any time within four years after the approval of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLARGED HOMESTEAD.

The bill (H. R. 1698) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where any person qualified to make entry under the provisions of the act of February 19, 1909, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall make application to enter under the provisions of said acts any unappropriated public land in any State affected thereby which has not been designated as subject to entry under the act (provided said application is accompanied and supported by properly corroborated affidavit of the applicant in duplicate, showing prima facie that the land applied for is of the character contemplated by said acts), such application, together with the regular fees and commissions, shall be received by the register and receiver of the land district in which said land is located, and suspended until it shall have been determined by the Secretary of the Interior whether said land is actually of that character; that during such suspension the land described in said application shall be segregated by the said register and receiver and not subject to entry until the case is disposed of; and if it shall be determined that such land is of the character contemplated by the said acts, then such application shall be allowed; otherwise it shall be rejected, subject to appeal: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall apply to the application of a qualified entryman to make additional entry of unappropriated land adjoining his unperfected homestead entry, the area of which, together with his original entry, shall not exceed 320 acres.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of said act of February 19, 1909, and acts amendatory thereof, and also the provisions of this act, shall extend to and include the State of South Dakota: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may designate tracts of land in said State of South Dakota subject to entry under said acts, not exceeding in the aggregate 320,000 acres, which shall be subject to entry without the necessity of residence upon the land entered, such designation to be under the same conditions and limitations as are provided by section 6 of the act of June 17, 1910, relating to enlarged homesteads in the State of Idaho.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, to what States does that apply?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To the State of South Dakota. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the amendment just agreed to, the following:

Provided, That the provisions of section 6 of said act shall include and extend to all the States named in the first section of said act.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from Nevada kindly explain that amendment?

Mr. PITTMAN. This attempts to accomplish for all of the Western States exactly what the Senator from South Dakota is attempting to accomplish for his own individual State of South Dakota; but, to make the amendment a little more definite, I will modify it so as to read "of said act of February 19, 1909."

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nevada modifies the amendment by adding, after the words "of said act," the words "of February 19, 1909."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada as modified.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to say as to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada that I do not know that I have any objection to it; but section 6 of the act of 1909 to which he refers relates particularly to the State of Utah, and permits the Secretary of the Interior to designate not exceeding 2,000,000 acres of land of which entry may be made without the necessity of residence, whereas the act of 1910 relates alone to the State of Idaho; and in the amendment offered by myself I provide for 320,000 acres as the number of acres to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, and which may be subject to entry without the necessity of residence.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the States mentioned in the first section of the bill are the following: Colorado, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, Arizona, and New Mexico. All of those States have a great deal more public land than has the State of South Dakota, and the 2,000,000 acres mentioned is simply a limit upon the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior is not to permit this character of location on any land unless the land falls within the particular classification of section 6. There may not be nearly that much.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly safe to have that done. It seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is all right. If there is anything that needs changing as to the details of it, it could be shaped up in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment presented by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

COL. JAMES W. POPE.

The bill (S. 2353) to authorize the President to appoint Col. James W. Pope, assistant quartermaster general, to the grade of brigadier general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my copy of the calendar does not show a report of any kind on that bill. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of it to explain why the bill was introduced and why it should pass?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, Col. Pope has served actively for something like 40 years with great distinction and in various phases of the service. If he had remained for a short time longer upon the list of active officers, he would have been in line for promotion. He is a very meritorious man. He is afflicted with a trouble with his eyes which has put him to very considerable expense, and, of course, he is retired upon the pay which retired officers receive. However, I am not basing the application upon that ground. I am putting it entirely upon the meritorious services of the officer and as a reward for the services he has rendered.

Of course, there is no report from the office of the Secretary of War to the committee. There is a report, which I supposed was here, outlining at length the services of this officer, with which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is familiar. I had supposed, until the Senator called my attention to the fact, that the report of which I speak—which is not a committee report, however—had been made a committee report and attached here. I can say to the Senator that it is a very meritorious case.

Mr. SMOOT. We all know that there are hundreds of colonels who every day desire promotion to the rank of brigadier general. There have been a number of colonels located at Fort Douglas, particularly Col. Scott, and he should have been appointed a brigadier general, but the time for his retirement arrived perhaps one month before he would have been appointed a brigadier general. I never have thought that we could introduce a bill and have him made a brigadier general.

Mr. THOMAS. I think in an instance of that kind it is not only a desirable thing but a highly meritorious thing.

Mr. SMOOT. If this is to be the policy——

Mr. THOMAS. No; it is not.

Mr. SMOOT (continuing). Of course, I will know hereafter that in meritorious cases, such as the one of which I have just spoken, the committee will act favorably.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. This matter was very carefully considered, and particularly by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I was appointed a subcommittee to examine and report on Col. Pope's claim. I want to say that it is meritorious in every way, and I sincerely hope the bill will pass.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire why the bill is not accompanied with some report from some quarter, to give us some information about why this man is singled out for this honor?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have just said that I had been under the impression that the report to the committee had been embodied in the report to the Senate, and I am surprised that it is not here. I am not blaming anybody for it, but my impression was, when it was reported out of the committee, that that would be done.

Mr. WALSH. I am interested in the matter because I am very much interested in the elevation to the rank of brigadier general of a colonel in the Quartermaster's Department, and I did not know that it was an ordinary thing to do.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not an ordinary thing to do, Mr. President; but it is not an unprecedented thing to do, by any means. For example, in the report to the committee in this particular instance there is a long list of similar cases that have been provided for in a similar way.

Mr. WALSH. I think I shall be obliged to object; at least until I have an opportunity to see a report.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know what I am here for. I have not anything upon which I can act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

WILHELMINA ROHE.

The bill (H. R. 11166) for the relief of Wilhelmina Rohe was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of the pension laws John Rohe shall be hereafter held and considered to have been drowned in Nagasaki Harbor, Japan, on the 20th day of March, 1901, in line of duty and while in the service of the United States as a private in Company M, Twenty-sixth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, let that bill go over. I think the report shows very great doubt as to whether or not this man was drowned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ABRAHAM HOOVER.

The bill (H. R. 816) for the relief of Abraham Hoover was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Abraham Hoover, who was a private in Company H, Seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Infantry Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private in said company and regiment on or about the 16th day of September, 1863: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENT TO FRANCIS SCOTT KEY.

The bill (S. 5711) providing for the appropriation of a sum of money for the erection at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Md., of a monument to Francis Scott Key and the soldiers and sailors who participated in the Battle of North Point and the defense of Fort McHenry in the War of 1812, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, this bill has been cared for in the deficiency bill. Therefore I ask that the bill as it is on the calendar be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 7151) to remedy in the line of the Army the inequalities in rank due to the past system of regimental promotion, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CHARLES AUGUST MAYER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 136) to authorize the appointment of Charles August Mayer as a cadet at the United States Military Academy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLIFFORD HILDEBRANDT TATE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 137) to authorize the appointment of Clifford Hildebrandt Tate as a cadet at the United States Military Academy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire why these two bills are here for the appointment of cadets. The law makes very full provision for the appointment of cadets, and here seems to be two joint resolutions, introduced by the same Member of the Senate, for appointment. What are the special reasons?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are not really for appointment. These two young men failed in one or more of their studies—one study, I think. They bore most excellent reputations up at West Point, and the committee, after investigating the cases of both of them, thought that following precedents which had been heretofore established they might safely authorize their reinstatement if the President approved the action of Congress in authorizing it to be done. I will say to the Senator that similar bills were introduced in the House, and the House committee also reported favorably on both.

Mr. BURTON. Were there exceptional circumstances? Was it thought they did not have a fair opportunity in the examination, or did they come very near to passing and fail under such circumstances that it was thought it would be fair to give them a further chance?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They came very near passing. The committee felt, too, that there were exceptional circumstances, and that the boys ought to have another chance. They are both bright fellows, and their conduct while there was exemplary. The officers at the Military Academy testify to that fact. I will say to the Senator, in addition, that it has appeared in many cases where there have been failures in one study that they have been given another chance; have been given an opportunity to perfect themselves and to enter the academy again; but in these cases it was not done, and the committee were unanimous in feeling that the cases ought to receive favorable consideration.

Mr. BURTON. I am not going to object, Mr. President. I think this is a rather dangerous precedent.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I feel, Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me, that these are exceptional cases. I know both these young men as well as their families. They are most exemplary in habits and manner. They failed, however, in one study and only one. They passed an excellent examination except in one study, and they were immediately dismissed. They were not put back, but they were dismissed. The request was made that they might be permitted to go back and start again, but for reasons or purposes that satisfied the authorities that was not done. They have pressed their cases most earnestly. I know them well, and the treatment seems to have been really cruel. It has been their life and hope and aim and ambition to serve their country in a military capacity. They are most exceptional young men. I appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am happy to state that the result is the reporting out of these joint resolutions. I trust the Senate may pass the measures as reported.

Mr. BURTON. I shall not object.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to reappoint as a cadet at the United States Military Academy, without regard to age or the existence of vacancies, Clifford Hildebrandt Tate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to reinstate Clifford Hildebrandt Tate as a cadet at the United States Military Academy."

SYSTEM OF REGIMENTAL PROMOTION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In my absence temporarily from the Senate the bill (S. 1151) to remedy in the line of the Army the inequalities in rank due to the past system of regimental promotion was passed over. I hope very much that the Senate will consider that measure. I do not know who interposed the objection or what were the reasons for the objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood that it would take up considerable time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think it will, if the Senator will let me state the facts. The report goes into them quite at length, and I think there is merit in the bill. Has the Senator read the report?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not have time to read it all, as it is very long, but I think it is a very important bill, and it ought not to be considered this afternoon. It is general legislation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to say, in this connection, that practically the same bill was passed in favor of officers on the active list of the Army. It was included in the appropriation act of March 3, 1911. There are very few men who will be affected by this legislation if it passes. They are all of them past 75 years of age, and 40 of them have died in the past 18 months. In the very nature of things if the bill should become a law it could not do very much injury to the country, and it certainly would be of great benefit to these old men.

Mr. OVERMAN. What amount of money would it take?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not made a calculation, but I call the attention of the Senator to this fact: Under the measure there are 20 colonels and 33 lieutenant colonels who would become brigadier generals by retirement.

Mr. OVERMAN. I must object to the consideration of the bill until I can have an opportunity to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has gone over.

CAPT. DANIEL H. POWERS.

The bill (S. 1985) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Capt. Daniel H. Powers was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GRAND JUNCTION, COLO.

The bill (S. 4012) to increase the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$200,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States public building at Grand Junction, Colo., be, and the same hereby is, increased from the sum of $100,000 to the sum of $200,000, said increase being necessary in order to complete the building according to the present plans and specifications.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGIA RAILROAD & BANKING CO.

The bill (S. 926) for the relief of the Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

JAMES F. BARBOUR.

The bill (S. 4492) to authorize James F. Barbour and his successors in title to permanently maintain and use siding from the tracks of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad in the city of Washington was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

SPENCER ROBERTS.

The bill (H. R. 12844) for the relief of Spencer Roberts, a member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to appoint and promote Spencer Roberts, now a member of the Metropolitan police force of said District, in class 2, to any vacancy that may exist in class 3 of the Metropolitan police force.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. That being the unfinished business of the Senate, let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

LANDS AT SUSANVILLE, LASSEN COUNTY, CAL.

The bill (H. R. 16476) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the city of Susanville, in Lassen County, Cal., for certain lands, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM G. KERCKHOFF.

The bill (S. 5990) to authorize the sale and issuance of patent for certain land to William G. Kerckhoff was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to sell and issue patent to William G. Kerckhoff for the following real property situated in the county of Los Angeles, State of California, more particularly described as follows:

Commencing at the quarter corner of section 30, township 2 north, range 7 west, this corner being the northwest corner of the southwest quarter of said section 30, running thence easterly along the north line of said southwest quarter 990 feet; thence at right angles south 330 feet; thence at right angles westerly 660 feet; thence at right angles south 330 feet; thence west at right angles 330 feet to the range lines between range 8 west and range 7 west, San Bernardino base and meridian; thence northerly 575.4 feet to the point of beginning, containing 10 acres of land; on the payment of the sum of $2.50 per acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECURITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS.

The bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DALLAS, TEX.

The bill (S. 5630) for the erection of a public building at Dallas, Tex., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "purpose," to strike out "bounded by and running along the following streets for the distances hereinafter set out, to wit, 236.7 feet on Ervay Street, 267.2 feet on Bryan Street, 232.08 feet on Mason Street, and 267.33 feet on Cottage Street."

On page 2, line 3, after the word "courts," to strike out the words "the United States internal-revenue office, the United States engineer office," and, in line 8, to strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$1,250,000"; so as to make the bill read:

Be ie enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected, on the site heretofore acquired for that purpose, a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office, the United States courts, and other Government offices in the city of Dallas and State of Texas, the cost of said building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $1,250,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, after completion of the new Federal building herein provided for, to sell the old post office and Government building and site thereof, situated in the city of Dallas, State of Texas, at public or private sale, after proper advertisement, at such time and on such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, and to execute a quitclaim deed to the purchaser thereof, and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS AT PLUMMER, IDAHO.

The bill (S. 2692) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell all unsold lots in the town site of Plummer, Kootenai County, Idaho, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendment, on page 2, line 2, before the word "direction," to strike out "the" and insert "his," and in the same line, after the word "direction," to strike out the words "of the board of trustees of the village of Plummer, Kootenai County, Idaho," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be sold for cash all lots not heretofore disposed of within the town site of Plummer, Kootenai

County, Idaho, authorized to be disposed of under the act of June 21, 1906: Provided, That the purchase price of all town lots hereafter sold under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, in the said town site of Plummer, Kootenai County, Idaho, shall be paid for in cash, and he shall cause 25 per cent of the net proceeds arising through such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction for public improvements in the town site in which said lots are sold.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COL. JAMES W. POPE.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator who objected to the consideration of Senate bill 2353 does not persist in his objection and I ask for its consideration.

The bill (S. 2353) to authorize the President to appoint Col. James W. Pope, Assistant Quartermaster General, to the grade of brigadier general in the United States Army and place him on the retired list was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS OF QUINAIELT RESERVATION, WASH.

The bill (H. R. 12463) to authorize the withdrawal of lands on the Quinaielt Reservation, in the State of Washington, for lighthouse purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE FREDERICK KUNZ.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249) for the appointment of George Frederick Kunz as a member of the North American Indian Memorial Commission was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUREAU OF LABOR SAFETY.

The bill (H. R. 10735) to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH. I have an amendment which I will propose to that bill, but it is at my office, and I ask that it may be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator has an amendment to offer to the bill, and therefore desires to have it go over for the present?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIVELY. I hope we may have consideration of the bill this afternoon.

JAMES W. M'GREEVEY.

The bill (H. R. 12909) to correct the military record of James W. McGreevey was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. What is the objection to the bill? It has been thoroughly investigated by a subcommittee. I can not see any reason why it should not be put upon its passage.

Mr. BRYAN. I object to it. I have read the committee report.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. There was a subcommittee appointed to investigate it, and it considered it carefully.

Mr. BRYAN. The object is to place upon the pension roll a deserter, according to the showing of the committee in its report.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I do not understand that any pension whatever is asked.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course that is the object of the bill. It is the only object it could have. It is the sole purpose of it.

Mr. SMOOT. If it were not for that the beneficiary would not be asking for this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

REMOVAL OF REMAINS OF LATE ELSIE M'CAULLEY.

The bill (S. 5705) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Elsie McCaulley from Glenwood Cemetery, D. C., to Philadelphia, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to inquire why such a bill has to be introduced here? Why does the United States Congress have to pass a bill to allow the removal of the remains of a deceased person from the District to Philadelphia? Is it necessary that Congress should take such action?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know anything about it, but I heard the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], or some one on the floor, state when the bill first came up that it is necessary to have an act of Congress, as the authorities of the District can not grant permission to authorize the removal of the remains.

Mr. BURTON. I really should like to know under what circumstances it is necessary. It is a matter usually entirely within the jurisdiction of the health officer of cities. Of course, primarily it belongs to the relatives of the decedent, and unless there was some contagious disease or some danger to public health, I do not see why an act of Congress is required.

Mr. JONES. I have not read the report, but it is my recollection that they can not remove a body from the District of Columbia after a certain number of years, at any rate, even with the permission of the health office.

Mr. BURTON. That is a general law?

Mr. JONES. I think so. I have not examined it, but that is my recollection.

Mr. BURTON. It would seem to me to be a very singular regulation.

Mr. JONES. That is the law, if my recollection is correct.

Mr. BURTON. Suppose the friends of a decedent desire to remove the body to another place, are they prevented from doing so unless Congress solemnly takes action upon it by the passage of a bill?

Mr. JONES. They would be prevented, if my recollection is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. A similar bill was passed by the Senate a few weeks ago. The remains can be removed only by an act of Congress. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] had charge of a bill of a similar character, which was passed.

Mr. BURTON. Is the Senator from Maryland able to state the number of years within which no removal can be made?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am not.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN.

The bill (H. R. 13717) to provide for leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the entryman mentioned in section 2291, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of June 6, 1912 (37 Stat., 123), upon filing in the local land office notice of the beginning of such absence at his option shall be entitled to a leave of absence in one or two continuous periods not exceeding in the aggregate five months in each year after establishing residence; and upon the termination of such absence, in each period, the entryman shall file a notice of such termination in the local land office; but in case of commutation, the 14 months actual residence, as now required by law, must be shown, and the person commuting be at the time a citizen of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOARD OF MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. POMERENE. I am obliged to leave the Chamber, and with the consent of the chairman on Military Affairs I ask that the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 241) for the appointment of four members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

HARRY T. HERRING.

The bill (S. 5028) for the relief of Harry T. Herring was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Harry T. Herring, late a cadet at the Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Infantry in the Army, and to place him on the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant of Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIXTH INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 166) authorizing the President to designate two officers connected with the Public Health Service to represent the United States at the Sixth International Sanitary Conference of American States to be held at Montevideo, Uruguay, in December, 1914, and making an appropriation to pay the expenses of said representatives, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to appoint or designate two officers of the United States connected with the Public Health Service to represent the United States in the Sixth International Sanitary Conference of American States to be held at the city of Montevideo, Uruguay, in December, 1914, and to pay the necessary expenses of the representatives in attending the conference, including the expenses of assembling the necessary data and of the preparation of a report, the sum of $2,000 is appropriated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 2824) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," approved March 3, 1891, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 12, after the word "claimant" to insert "or alienage," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of paragraph 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," approved March 3, 1891, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"First. That in all claims for property of citizens or inhabitants of the United States, except the claims of Indians heretofore or now in tribal relations, taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States without just cause or provocation on the part of the owner or agent in charge, and not returned or paid for, and in all adjudications under said act as now amended, the alienage of the claimant shall not be a defense to said claimant: Provided, That the privileges of this act shall not extend to any person whose property at the time of its taking was unlawfully within the Indian country: Provided further, That all cases heretofore filed under said act of March 3, 1891, and which have been dismissed by the court for want of proof of the citizenship of the claimant or alienage shall be reinstated and readjudicated in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the presentation of any other claims than those upon which suit has heretofore been brought in the Court of Claims: Provided further, That all acts and parts of acts in so far as they conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS L. GRIFFITHS.

The bill (S. 6162) authorizing issuance of patent for certain lands to Thomas L. Griffiths was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue to Thomas L. Griffiths a patent for lot 3 of section 30 in township 29 south of range 8 west of the Salt Lake meridian, in the State of Utah, provided that he shall first have paid at the rate of $1.25 per acre therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. FORSTER REAL ESTATE CO., OF ST. LOUIS, MO.

The bill (H. R. 11765) to perfect the title to land belonging to the M. Forster Real Estate Co., of St. Louis, Mo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA HAZELWOOD.

The bill (S. 2668) for the relief of Martha Hazelwood was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confer full jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to rehear and retry the claim of Martha Hazelwood for damages suffered by her husband on account of depredations of the Kiowa and Comanche Indians in Texas from 1865 to 1871, and to award judgment therein in the same manner and to the same effect as if the motion for a new trial had been entered within the term at which the petition was dismissed and allowed, and to the same effect as if the case was being heard de novo; and provides that all evidence, memorandum, and other data filed with the claim in the Indian Office, or memorandum of the same, and any testimony since that time taken and filed in the Court of Claims, are made competent evidence for the consideration of the court in determining the issues in the case, and upon them the court is directed to award its judgment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does that bill provide that the Court of Claims shall proceed to judgment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the bill.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will not object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

ELLA M. EWART.

The bill (H. R. 6420) for the relief of Ella M. Ewart was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $135 to enable the Postmaster General to reimburse Ella M. Ewart, a clerk in the post office at Marion, Ohio, that amount made good by her to the United States on account of a postal savings certificate fraudulently paid without fault or negligence on her part.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF JOHN STEWART, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 1373) for the relief of the estate of John Stewart, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE], who reported the bill, why $2,000 should be appropriated as extra compensation, but I see the Senator is not present.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it go over.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I will ask that the bill be passed over temporarily until I can confer with my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER], who introduced it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily.

WILLIAM E. MURRAY.

The bill (H. R. 3920) for the relief of William E. Murray was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay William E. Murray $720, in full compensation for personal injuries sustained by him without fault on his part and while in the discharge of his duties as a watchman in the Department of the Interior, as found by the Court of Claims, in findings of fact filed May 20, 1909, and printed in House Document No. 226, Sixty-first Congress, second session; but no sum of money due or to become due to William E. Murray under this act shall be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process whatever, but shall inure wholly to his benefit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.

The bill (S. 5695) for the relief of the Southern Transportation Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Southern Transportation Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., $5,556.70, to reimburse that company for the repairs, expenses, and demurrage in connection with the barge Anticlam, owned by it, on account of damage to the barge by collision with U. S. lightship No. 80.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Virginia why there was not a report filed to accompany the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There was no written report made because a letter was received from the department which set forth the matter so clearly and fully that I did not think it necessary to write out a report. The letter is in the papers and can be read if the Senator desires to hear it. The matter has been very carefully investigated and every item of expense incurred has been approved by the department.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take the Senator's word for it, but it would have been very much better to have had the letter incorporated in a written report.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The letter is in the papers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the preamble be stricken out.

The preamble was rejected.

ESTATE OF HENRY H. SIBLEY, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 1851) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Henry H. Sibley, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like for the Senator from Nebraska to withhold that request. This bill has been continuously introduced in Congress for the last 25 or 30 years. There was a partnership existing between two persons, one of whom was in the Confederate Army and the other in the Union Army. The Court of Claims allowed the partner who was in the Union Army the full amount which the Government contracted to pay, but the one who was in the Confederate Army has not been allowed anything. It seems to me that inasmuch as the case was decided favorably by the Court of Claims and then went to the Supreme Court, which held that the Government was liable for the amount, it ought to be allowed.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] reported the bill. The Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I understand, desire to file a minority report. It was agreed between those two Senators and the Senator from South Dakota, who had to leave the Chamber and is not present here to-day, that they might have time in which to do so. I think the request made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is perfectly proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BUREAU OF LABOR SAFETY.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Montana has now prepared the amendment which he desires to offer to the bill (H. R. 10735) to create a bureau of labor safety in the Department of Labor, and I now ask consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I join with the Senator from Indiana in asking that we now recur to the bill named by him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read.

Mr. WALSH. I present the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that the bill go over to-day.

Mr. SHIVELY. I hope the Senator may withdraw his objection and not compel the bill to go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been asked by a Senator who is not present to request that the bill go over. I want to call the Senator's attention to another feature of the bill. The amendment which the Senator from Montana proposes to offer, I presume, is the one that was suggested to several of us designed to take care of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. WALSH. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there is another question that seems to me is even more serious than that. The bill reads:

There shall be a commissioner of labor safety, who shall be at the head of said bureau, to be appointed by the President, and who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the bill establish another bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I think it had better go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is a provision which will impose upon the proposed bureau a duty which I think it will be very hard, if not impossible, to perform.

And also the study of devices and methods for the prevention of vocational diseases, and to make public the results of such investigation, examination, and study from time to time.

What are vocational diseases?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I can not give the precise technical definition of vocational diseases, but it is patent they are diseases peculiar to certain employments—say, lead poisoning to the painter.

Mr. SMOOT. I can think of lead poisoning, which is a vocational disease, for the reason that the inhaling of the lead is the real cause of that disease.

Mr. WALSH. We have many cases of miners' consumption in Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there are some, but I know of very few of that class of diseases that are vocational diseases. It seems to me that that is not of sufficient importance to justify the creation of a new bureau, if that is all this bill is designed to do.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator please, that is only one of the objects the bill is designed to accomplish, though this is by no means unimportant. The value of this feature is not to be judged by the number of vocational diseases the Senator can count offhand. In any event, to investigate and report on these diseases is only one function of the proposed bureau.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator tell us how much this bill is going to cost the Government?

Mr. SHIVELY. The bill indicates the magnitude of the establishment. The head of the bureau will cost the Government $5,000 a year.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose he will be coming here the next year with a request for about $200,000 more.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator is supposing things that may or may not come to pass. Suppose the saving by stopping preventable accidents be five times that?

Mr. SMOOT. If they request no less than $200,000, I will be very greatly surprised.

Mr. SHIVELY. Do I understand the Senator to withdraw his objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the consideration of the bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will examine into this question by the time the calendar is called again. Employers and employees of the country are both interested in this subject. It goes to the protection of human life and limb.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly will look into the matter; but I desire to say to the Senator that to create a bureau is a very simple thing to do. We were told time and time again that the creation of a certain bureau would not involve the expenditure of more than $25,000 at any time of its history, and that was the smallest bureau that we have ever created since I have been in the Senate; but the last appropriation bill carried for that bureau $190,000. In one bill there was the sum of $169,000, and then there was a sum of $28,000 in addition to that, making over $190,000.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I certainly hope the Senator will look into this matter so that we may secure action, at all events, at an early day. As has been suggested by my colleague, this is a measure that has the support of the employees of the country and of the employers alike. It is a measure in which all the States are becoming increasingly interested, just as the question of accident compensation is being forced on the attention of their respective legislatures. The measure contemplates action to reduce the awful toll that preventable accidents ever lay on workingmen and their families.

Mr. SMOOT. It may, Mr. President, have that object and it may be a splendid thing, but before we create another bureau I think we ought to know something about what it is going to cost the Government. If it is to accomplish what the Senator says, I would not care if it cost $150,000, but I really think we ought to know something about what the expense is going to be and how large an army of men we will be compelled to provide for.

Mr. OVERMAN. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah withhold his objection until the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] may be considered? It might be well to amend the bill before laying it aside.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, then, will be pending.

Mr. KERN. I also have an amendment to the bill which limits the cost of organization and salaries to $15,000. I will ask that that also be pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana will be pending. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

GEORGE P. HEARD.

The bill (H. R. 2728) for the relief of George P. Heard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to allow George P. Heard, late captain, Medical Corps, United States Army, to take the examination prescribed by law and under the regulations for the government of the Army for the grade of major in the Medical Corps, and if he successfully passes the required examination the President is authorized to appoint him a major, Medical Corps, upon the active list of the Army; but the number of officers shall not be increased by reason of his appointment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT ROCKINGHAM, N. C.

The bill (S. 5113) for increase of cost of a site for a post-office building in the city of Rockingham, N. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in securing a suitable site for a post-office building in the city of Rockingham, N. C., to increase the limit of cost from $5,000 to $10,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SHELBYVILLE, TENN.

The bill (H. R. 13415) to increase the limit of cost of public building at Shelbyville, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Shelbyville, Tenn., $5,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REZIN HAMMOND.

The bill (S. 3663) for the relief of Reezes Hammond was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, before the word "Hammond," to strike out "Reezes" and insert "Rezin," and on the same page, line 10, after "sixty-three," to insert "Provided, That no back pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Rezin Hammond, who was a private in Company A, Thirteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 18th day of March, 1863: Provided, That no back pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Rezin Hammond."

JOHN E. JOHNSON.

The bill (S. 3107) for the relief of John E. Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, John E. Johnson shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company F, Twenty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, on the 16th day of June, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC BETHURUM.

The bill (S. 5970) for the relief of Isaac Bethurum was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that in the administration of the laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Isaac Bethurum, who was a private of Company B, Fifteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 17th day of October, 1865: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or pension shall accrue to him prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RURAL POST ROADS.

The bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall in certain cases aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ARTHUR E. RUMP.

The bill (H. R. 6609) for the relief of Arthur E. Rump was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 to Arthur E. Rump, of St. Louis, Mo., to compensate him in full for all claims he may have against the United States arising out of injuries received by him while in the Government employ in the United States post office at St. Louis, Mo., in May, 1902.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TONOPAH, NEV.

The bill (S. 4256) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Tonopah, Nev., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the United States post office and other governmental offices at Tonopah, in the State of Nevada, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, not to exceed the sum of $80,000: Provided, That the building when constructed shall be unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of at least 40 feet on either side, including streets and alleys.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK H. LEMLY.

The bill (S. 3561) to appoint Frederick H. Lemly, a passed assistant paymaster on the active list of the United States Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Frederick H. Lemly a passed assistant paymaster on the active list of the Navy, to take the same rank and position on the list of passed assistant paymasters that he occupied on March 5, 1908 (the date upon which his resignation as a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy was accepted): Provided, That the said Frederick H. Lemly shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy by the usual examinations required for promotion to the grade of passed assistant paymaster his fitness in all respects to perform the duties thereof: Provided further, That the said Frederick H. Lemly shall be carried as additional to the number of the grade to which he may be appointed or at any time thereafter promoted: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as entitling said Frederick H. Lemly to any pay or allowances from the date of the acceptance of his resignation herein referred to and the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the consideration of bills on the calendar.

ELIZABETH RIVER BRIDGE, VIRGINIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here a bridge bill (S. 6227, S. Rept. 746) which I report favorably from the Committee on Commerce, and which was introduced by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who is very anxious to have it passed. I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I want it understood that this is done by unanimous consent. We agreed to do no business whatever, with the exception of taking up the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understood that we had completed the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. We have, and that completed the work we were understood to do to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. When the unanimous-consent agreement is exhausted there is no reason for another unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTON. What is the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6227) granting the consent of Congress to the Norfolk-Berkley Bridge Corporation, of Virginia, to construct a bridge across the eastern branch of the Elizabeth River in Virginia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, are we in the stage of the presentation of bills?

Mr. OVERMAN. By unanimous consent.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida makes the point of order that no further business except the calendar can be considered, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, we passed over temporarily Order of Business 298, the omnibus claims bill. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he will object to having the bill read at this time?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think I must object to that. There are 132 pages in that bill. The session to-day was for a special purpose. As the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] most aptly remarked yesterday, the Members of the Senate were weary, and it was at first contemplated that we should adjourn over until Monday. We met, as I understand, to dispose of legislation which may be styled "detail legislation."

We have attended to one very important bill to-day, the anti-narcotic bill; but I do not think this measure ought to be taken up. I do not think it ought even to have the advantage that will be given to it by reason of the first reading. Those two bills naturally go together—Order of Business 298 and Order of Business 594—and it is in the power of the majority to set aside a day for their consideration. I think they should be taken care of in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, Mr. President, I am going to ask that the Senate meet Tuesday night for the purpose of considering the two omnibus claims bills upon the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better for the Senator to make that request on Monday, when there are a number of Senators here?

Mr. BRYAN. There are enough here now. This bill has been upon the calendar for more than five months, and important legislation has the same right for consideration as unimportant legislation. The Senator from Ohio objects now to a mere reading of the bill. The Senator need not stay here. Nothing else will be done. He objects to that being done; so the only way ever to have it read is to have a session some night and let that be done, and then another session, I suppose, so that the bill may be acted upon.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to think——

Mr. BRYAN. I understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to think that I do not want to have a session of the Senate Tuesday night. I am perfectly willing to have a session Tuesday night, but I do think a request of that kind ought to be made when there are more Senators present than are here at this time. I do not think the Senator from Florida will have any trouble on Monday in getting an agreement to meet Tuesday night for this particular purpose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. What would be the difference between Tuesday night and now? This bill is made up, really, of unobjected cases. Every doubtful claim was eliminated. The claims in it are largely church claims, claims of eleemosynary institutions, and claims that are perfectly just. The Government owes them, and it has been ascertained by the Court of Claims that they are due.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I can not take the Senator from Virginia quite so seriously as usual in making that statement. Here are two bills, one of 132 pages and the other of 102. The first bill must contain at least 2,000 claims, including quite a number that have come in by Senate amendments. The second bill must contain a thousand claims. How can it be said that these are all unobjected claims, claims that we should pass without attention, when they are practically 50 years old, every one of them?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We can give attention to them now just as easily as Tuesday night.

Mr. BURTON. I think it is something which ought not to be attended to in haste, or even begun Saturday afternoon at 4.50 o'clock. We ought at least to have a chance to scrutinize these claims. If we were to pass them by and say they were unobjected, we might as well turn over the whole subject of passing upon claims to the Committee on Claims, and say the Senate has no responsibility in the premises.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That has been done with every claim that has been passed to-day.

Mr. BURTON. I understand from at least one member of the committee that he did not know about any of these claims.

Mr. BRYAN. What possible harm can come from the reading of the bill this afternoon?

Mr. BURTON. In the first place, it is now 4.50 o'clock. If the bill is read, it should not be a mere travesty. It should be actually read. The reading clerk should not merely read a line at the top of each page. It should be read in full. That will take at least two hours or more. Then, again, I think we should have ample time to consider this measure. I shall place no obstacle in the way of meeting at a proper time when we can take up this subject deliberately and in an orderly manner.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. There are certainly not more than 20 Members of the Senate on the floor at present, and I do not think we ought to take up the bill on Saturday afternoon or even fix the time when we shall take it up, though I shall not now object to fixing a date, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me prefer my request, then. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate meet——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That can not be done without a roll call.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, yes, it can. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate meet Tuesday night at 8 o'clock to take up the omnibus claims bill on the calendar—two of them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. We can not agree to take up the bill without a roll call.

Mr. BRYAN. Why, of course we can. We can not get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote upon a bill without a roll call, but we can agree to proceed to the consideration of a bill without a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has twice addressed the Chair. The Chair will now recognize him.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to join the Senator from Florida in the very earnest request he is making that in case the bill is not taken up this afternoon it may be considered Tuesday evening. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it should be very carefully considered. I apprehend that no one is going to insist upon the passage of the bill until that shall be done; but in order to consider it carefully we ought to have plenty of time, and the time that would be taken up in reading the bill this evening, as requested by the Senator from Florida, would save just that much time in the subsequent consideration of the bill.

Every Member of the Senate is going to scrutinize this bill. He is going to consider every item in it. The reading is usually perfunctory. Nobody pays any especial attention to it. The Senators read the bill themselves.

If the Senator from Ohio objects to having the bill read this afternoon, I hope he will not object to taking up the bill Tuesday evening for consideration. There are claims here that are old, it is true, and if the Government owes these claims it should pay them. The Government of the United States can not afford to be unjust and unfair with its citizens. If these claims were against private individuals, it would be regarded as bad faith if the debtor should hesitate to pay his honest debts.

The question ought to be determined as to whether or not the Government owes these claims. If the Government owes them it is the duty of Congress, it is the duty of the Senate, to pass the bill and make the appropriation. I have a great many constituents who are interested in the items of this bill. Their claims have been passed upon by the Court of Claims. They have been adjudicated. There is scarcely any doubt about the liability of the Government to them; and I do sincerely hope that objection will not be made to fixing a time Tuesday evening for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have no objection to fixing a time, so far as that is concerned, for coming in here to consider these bills; but I think the request is contrary to the unanimous-consent agreement made yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I was going to say.

Mr. JONES. The calendar, as I understand, has been completed; and I make the point of order that the request is contrary to the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 12161. An act to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell; and

H. R. 12796. An act to provide for the removal of the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park and for its transfer to the control of the Department of Agriculture.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 110) to tax the privilege of dealing on exchanges, boards of trade, and similar places in contracts of sale of cotton for future delivery, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 12161. An act to remove the charge of desertion against John Mitchell was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. R. 12796. An act to provide for the removal of the Botanic Garden to Rock Creek Park and for its transfer to the control of the Department of Agriculture, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Library.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m., Saturday, August 15, 1914) the Senate took a recess until Monday, August 17, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 15, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We praise and magnify Thy holy name, our Father in heaven, for this day, which marks an epoch in the world's progress—the opening of the Panama Canal, the greatest engineering feat extant, the gift of our Republic to all mankind, an illustration of man's wonderful capabilities. May it be an inspiration to those who shall come after us to strive for the victories of peace rather than the victories of war; that nation may vie with nation in the things which make for brotherhood; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all hearts. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5449. An act to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 1055) for the relief of T. S. Williams, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. LEE of Maryland, and Mr. NORRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on August 13, 1914, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes;

S. 4969. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5278. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5501. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5899. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 110. An act to tax the privilege of dealing on exchanges, boards of trade, and similar places in contracts of sale of cotton for future delivery, and for other purposes.

Mr. DONOHOE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. DONOHOE. To ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. DONOHOE. The gentleman will not withhold it for a moment?

Mr. MANN. No.

REQUEST FOR LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request for leave of absence, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS,
Washington, D. C., August 15, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I respectfully ask leave of absence for two weeks on account of important matters, both public and private. I remain, Yours, very truly, FRANK PLUMLEY.

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a letter from the Hon. ANDREW J. PETERS, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I herewith tender my resignation as a Member of the United States Congress from the eleventh Massachusetts district, to take effect on Saturday, August 15, 1914.

Respectfully, yours, ANDREW J. PETERS.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14685. An act to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 5449. An act to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

WATER POWER ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 16673, to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in the chair.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. To ask if it is too late at this moment to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House resolution 571?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, in that case, it would take objection, would it not, if the Speaker had not left the chair?

The SPEAKER. It would take objection to do what?

Mr. MURDOCK. To stop the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] from bringing his resolution up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas can not get up a resolution at all in the Committee of the Whole. The Chair had announced that the House automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in the chair, and the gentleman from New York had started when the Speaker was done, and the Speaker will not resume the chair until the gentleman from New York gets through.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16673. When the committee rose on Thursday there was pending the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported? The debate was two or three days ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PAGE of North Carolina: Page 1, line 13, strike out the words "national monuments," and page 2, line 15, strike out the words "national monuments."

Amendment by Mr. MONDELL: Page 1, line 13, strike out the words "and other"; page 2, line 1, strike out the word "reservations"; page 2, line 13, strike out the words "or reservations"; page 2, line 15, strike out the words "or reservations."

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming, to add to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, striking out certain words—certain other words.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the amendments close at the expiration of—how much time?

Mr. MILLER. I want five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not want to close debate on the proposition of including Indian reservations?

Mr. FERRIS. I thought we could have an agreement to get through with this amendment. We had considerable debate on it the other day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have time to debate the Indian reservation amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MANN. That is another matter.

Mr. FERRIS. I mean this amendment and all amendments to it. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that at the expiration of 10 minutes, 5 of which shall be occupied by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and 5 by myself, all debate be closed on this amendment and all amendments thereto. I will make it 15 minutes or even 20 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose and the House adjourned I had the floor and had 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time had expired.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; but it was extended.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, there is no disposition to shut off the gentleman from Minnesota. I understand he wanted to talk on his amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I wanted 5 minutes to talk on the amendment that I had started to talk about.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes—5 minutes to be occupied by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], 5 by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], 5 by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], 5 by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and 5 by myself. Then other amendments can be offered under the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of 25 minutes—5 minutes to be occupied by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Oklahoma—the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a word further in reference to whether or not Indian reservations are included in the language of this bill.

Since the committee adjourned on Thursday I have taken occasion to again read carefully the language of this paragraph and succeeding paragraphs, and I am further convinced, and emphatically convinced, that the language does not include Indian reservations.

Furthermore, I think it should not include Indian reservations. But if there is any possibility in the mind of any gentleman here that it does include Indian reservations, I think it should be amended so as to except them.

Now, a word as to the language. The language of the bill is that it is proposed to lease, under certain conditions, portions of the territory, lands, and other property of the United States. Indian reservations could never be comprehended within an act of this kind by implication. They must be specifically included. The object of the bill is not to lease property belonging to others, but to lease property belonging to the United States; and if it is designed not only to lease property belonging to the people of the United States, but also to lease property belonging to people other than the people of the United States, the legal title of which is in the United States as trustee, why, of course, specific and appropriate language will be necessary. But in the face of the words "property of the United States" no court in Christendom, according to my opinion, would ever construe it as applying to property in the hands of a guardian belonging to a ward, or in the hands of a trustee belonging to a cestui que trust; and there is every reason on earth why it should not apply to Indian reservations. The mind almost stops in its effort to comprehend what would be done with the Indian property in the hands of the United States if this act did apply. It is proposed to do a great many things in this bill, and if it is intended that these things can be done respecting Indian property, then it is the purpose of the bill to affect Indian property in certain revolutionary ways.

As I said at the outset, this has never received the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs or any of the persons immediately connected with the management of Indian affairs, so far as I know, excepting that it is stated that it has been referred to the Indian Office for an opinion as to whether or not the language included Indian reservations.

Now, it is fortunate that there are several distinguished gentlemen on the Public Lands Committee who are very well versed in Indian affairs. I question whether their attention was ever directed to the fact that the terms of this bill were intended to include Indian reservations, and I question further whether they ever gave consideration to the application of the terms of this bill to the property of the Indians.

Now, just look at the thing the bill proposes to do. It proposes to lease to private citizens or corporations of any State in the Union water powers on lands for a period of 50 years. Has the Indian said anything about his desire to have his property tied up in perpetuity, it may be? Because there is a provision that after the period of 50 years the property, if not continued to the present corporation, may be bought and taken over by another, and from that time on I suppose until human life disappears from the face of the earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. I only got started, but I will take occasion to say something more later on. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to address myself partly to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], who seems to be busily engaged with other gentlemen.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has my attention.

Mr. MONDELL. When we legislate touching the landed property of the United States, all of it, and desire to use an all-embracing term, we say "the public lands and reservations of the United States." The words "public lands" embrace all public lands, or all lands that the United States owns, except lands that are reserved for some specific purpose. The word "reservations" includes all lands of the United States set apart for some special purpose. Now, when we come to use the term "public lands" in recent times, it is necessary to use some qualifying words, by reason of the fact that sometimes public lands are temporarily reserved for certain purposes, but that temporary reservation for those certain purposes does not constitute those lands a reservation. It makes them reserved public lands. Now, this bill applies, first, to the public lands; that is, all of the public lands, all of the lands the Government owns except the reservations of all sorts and kinds. But in order to make it perfectly clear that we intend to cover public lands reserved, as well as public lands unreserved, we use the words "public lands, reserved and unreserved," so that the words in lines 11 and 12 include all of the public lands, whether temporarily reserved under the withdrawal acts or otherwise.

The other provisions of the bill relate to various classes of reservations, naming them. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] moved to strike out one class of reservations, to wit, national monuments, and I think they ought to go out. I propose to ask also to strike out the words "and other reservations," so that if my amendment is adopted and the amended motion of the gentleman from North Carolina carries, the bill will then refer to the public lands, all of them, reserved and unreserved, and to the forest reserves. Now, that is all that the bill should relate to. It should cover all of the public lands, whether temporarily reserved or not. It should cover all of the forest reserves, but it should not include any kind of a reservation for a specific purpose, permanently made.

Now, let me reiterate that. The Government has two kinds of landed property—public lands and reservations. In order to include all public lands you must use the term "reserved and unreserved" if you intend to take them all in. Now, that is what the committee has done. The public lands—that is, the public lands not in permanent reservations; the public lands, reserved and unreserved—ought to be included in the bill. All reservations except forest reserves ought to be excluded from the bill. And if the amendment which I have offered to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is adopted, and that amendment is adopted, the bill will then apply to all of the public lands, reserved and unreserved, and to the forest reserves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I call the particular attention of the committee to the fact that the exclusion of monuments would exclude from use all of the potential water power lying in a district consisting of 660,000 acres in the Olympic Peninsula, and known as the Olympus Monument.

Mr. Chairman, while I am opposed to this entire bill, I feel sure that if we are going to have regulation at all the regulations should include that enormous water power in that large district. I want to take advantage of this opportunity to say that by the passage of such bills as this, broad in their scope, you bring about just such situations as was brought about when we suddenly found our Olympus Monument made for us, without any warrant of law. It has been suggested to me that I should not object to this amendment excluding monuments to go into this bill, and that I should then undertake some special legislation to relieve the Olympus Monument situation. Gentlemen, the Members from Washington have tried that. It must be apparent to every Member of Congress that the western Members are here all of the time, working day and night with private bills, trying to relieve this and certain situations that were brought about through bills of this kind in the past—to say nothing of doubtful Executive orders. The great hope of the Olympic Peninsula is that development will come to it. Within the last two or three years we have succeeded in bringing a trunk line of railroad to the north side of the peninsula—the Chicago, Milwaukee & Puget Sound Railroad—at an immense expense. If this amendment is added, and the bill passes, there will be all of the water power in 660,000 acres of mountainous country tied up still further. It is tied up now. This adds another knot.

In that great monument even now one can not, without special permission, drive a pick or strike a match. That is what has happened in the Olympus Monument. If you are going to regulate water power do not make useless for the next 50 years the water power that is in that great stretch of territory.

The Olympic Peninsula is drained by many rivers, most of which head in the Olympus Monument and radiate outward toward the four points of the compass. The streams flowing to the east empty into Hood Canal, and are short, with steep descents. Chief of these are the Quilcene, Dusewallips, Duckabush, Hamahama, and Skokomish. To the south flow the Humptulips, Hoquiam, Wishkah, Wynooche, and three branches of the Satsop. To the north, into the Strait of Juan de Fuca, flow the Dungeness and Elwha, while to the west the Quillayute, with its branches, the Dickey, Soleduck, Bogachiel, and Kalawa, and the Hoh River, Queets River, the Clearwater, and the Queniult flow directly into or toward the Pacific Ocean—quite a number of swift rivers to be tied up not only now but for still further time under this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether the adoption of the amendment would make any change in the provisions of the section unless further amendment were made. The section reads:

Any part of the lands and other property of the United States.

If you strike out "including" and all that follows it, that does not change the situation, because the bill covers as it stands all lands and all other property of the United States. That includes everything. It would include the Capitol Building, if you could use it—everything. I had supposed that the intention of this bill was to give to the Secretary of the Interior power to make leases for water-power purposes of the lands of the United States—the public domain. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said that that would not include national forests. Of course, nobody doubts that the desire is to include national forests; and, if anything is to be done with it, it ought to include national forests, because probably that is where most of the water power is. I do not think Congress ought to give to the Secretary of the Interior, without further congressional action, the power to lease any of the property of the United States other than where it is necessary for water-power purposes, on the public domain or in the national forests. I have no objection to laying down rules and regulations, such as we did in the Adamson bill, for the leasing of such property when Congress shall specifically authorize it. I do not believe that we ought to start in by giving a blanket authority to the Secretary of the Interior, however much confidence we may have in the present Secretary or in future Secretaries or in the Interior Department, to make leases, without control, of all of the property or any of the property of the United States which some one may desire for the development of power or the construction of dams. No one knows how far that will go.

I understood the gentleman to say that an amendment was to be offered that would restrict this authority as to the navigable streams. Of course, I do not know just what that amendment will cover. As the bill stands it would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease locks and dams constructed by the Government out of the Federal Treasury, under the supervision of the War Department. That is undoubtedly the way it stands in the bill. It is now proposed to remove any question about that; but that would still leave open a very wide latitude of authority. For instance, we have property reserved at the headwaters of the Mississippi and other places for the purpose of providing a permanent water suply. Under the terms of this bill that is property of the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior may lease it for power purposes. You may say that he will not abuse the authority. Maybe he will not and maybe he will. Nobody knows. Any Secretary of the Interior himself very likely would not, but matters of this sort are not disposed of in the individual cases as a rule by the Secretary himself. They are disposed of by inferior officials, who, even if they do the best they can, are liable under the provisions of this law to do something that we might consider to be an abuse of authority. I think the bill ought to be amended so as to apply to the public lands, including forest reserves—the public domain—and then, if when that is in successful operation there is any occasion for extending it, it could be done either by special act of Congress giving somebody authority to construct a dam in accordance with the provision of this act or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, neither of the amendments offered is intended to destroy the bill, and neither of them, if adopted, would materially harm the bill, but this is the situation: The act of June 25, 1910, known as the Pickett Act, or the general withdrawal act, gave the President of the United States power to withdraw any of the public lands for any public purpose. My thought is, and the thought of our committee in constructing this provision was, that numerous withdrawals had been made. Hundreds of thousands of acres had been withdrawn. What for? Some for mineral purposes, some for national monument purposes, some for forestry purposes, some for oil purposes, some for water rights, some for this, and some for that. Many of these so-called Executive-order reservations embrace thousands of acres of hills that will not be mined within the generation, or perhaps will never be mined, and may or may not have any value for mineral, and so forth. It is the thought of the committee, it is the thought of the Interior Department, and of all of the Government officers who appeared before us that if there was water power on any of these reservations going to waste, it ought to be used. Personally, I feel that these amendments eliminating certain reservations ought to be voted down for the simple reason of sensible procedure and development of every resource that we have. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] complains that if this does apply to Indian reservations, he thinks it should not be done, and thinks that it has had no consideration.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he suggests an amendment to the first proviso of section 8, which provides that the proceeds from any water-power development on Indian lands shall go into the funds of the Indians. In other words, I repeat, if the House decrees that these two amendments should be adopted and all these withdrawals and all these reservations will lie in idleness and the water will flow on to the sea, it will not destroy our bill. Again, in the alternative, should we create a separate water-power bureau in the Indian Office, which is under the Department of the Interior; should we create a water-power bureau in the General Land Office, which is under the Interior Department; should we create a water-power bureau under the Forest Service, which is under the Secretary of Agriculture? Should we create a little one-horse water-power bureau in each of these departments? Now, you must deal with one of two conditions. You will either let this water run idle to the sea, a total waste, or you will find an appeal coming from the Indian Office and all these other bureaus asking that they have a water-power bureau in their respective departments, and the result will be you will multiply help, duplicate work, and the whole proceeding would be lacking in good administration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at this moment. I repeat, you will multiply the number of officers, you will make the question more complex and difficult, you will be duplicating and triplicating by doing the same identical thing. I again repeat that these amendments are not vital to the bill. No doubt the Members who propose them believe they will, and no doubt that good patriotic supporters might well differ as to whether they ought to be included or not. Personally I think we ought to have in one place a head of the water-power proposition. As the matter now stands we have two departments that must necessarily take care of the water power—the War Department on navigable waters and streams, through the engineers, and the Interior Department on the public lands—and reservations and the nonreservations ought to be controlled by the one department that has to do with the disposal of the lands. Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In regard to a considerable number of these national monuments, is it not a fact they are and will be handled by the Secretary of Agriculture, while still others will be handled under this bill by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. FERRIS. In the forest reserves that is true; so far as it relates to forestry that is of course true. That part of it went to them years ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And that brings about a situation of a double-headed management with so many laws concerning them that any man who wants to know about the public lands can not pick them out.

Mr. FERRIS. What the gentleman states is partially true, but the gentleman must view it from this standpoint: Take, for example, either the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] or the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who are experts on Indian affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think it would be advisable, when we have progressed so well in our management of these matters in the Indian Bureau, to wait and see whether this bill will be successful in its application to public lands? Why should we open the development at once to all the water power in the country? Why not try the experiment on the public lands before we reach out to the Indian reservations?

Mr. FERRIS. This water power is not so much of an experiment as the gentleman thinks. They have been developing water power already under the defective makeshift known as the revocable-permit law of 1901. So many people have failed to take the time required to keep up with development on the public domain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming offered to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 35, noes 38.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. In a moment. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the Page amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 13, after the word "monuments," insert the words "except Mount Olympus National Monument and Grand Canyon National Monument," and also, on page 2, line 12, after the word "monument"——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moved to strike out certain words. What is the amendment of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can only make it plain in this way: That where the gentleman's amendment proposes to leave the word "monuments" out of that provision I wish to except Mount Olympus National Monument——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is not in order in the form in which it is offered. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. PAGE of North Carolina) there were—ayes 48, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and nine Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, before the word "for," insert "or Indian reservations or in lands or property held by the United States in trust."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted there will be specifically excluded from the operations of this act Indian reservations and lands held in trust by the United States. I believe we can experiment, if we want to, in respect to our own properties, but we have no right to experiment with properties which we hold in trust. Under the provisions of this bill the revenues from water-power plants whether on Indian reservations or elsewhere go into the General Treasury. Now, I understand the chairman of the committee stated the other day that it was his intention to offer an amendment specifying that revenues from water powers on Indian reservations should be applied to Indian purposes. I admit that a method of computation could be worked out and that an equitable distribution could be made of the proceeds, but that is a detail that has no bearing on the propriety of the entire legislation.

As I said a moment ago, it is proposed to tie up these water powers forever without the Indians having one word to say about the proposition. Now, it just happens that there are wonderfully fine water powers on many of the Indian reservations to-day. We have a great variety of irrigation projects being developed on Indian reservations, costing millions of dollars, for which already millions have been appropriated, and for which millions more are to be appropriated. We expect to make these appropriations reimbursable from the Indians' property. They are going to pay for them out of their own means. As an incident to these irrigation projects, there is natural opportunity to develop water power. Why, just take one illustration on the Blackfoot Reservation, a project originally estimated to cost $4,000,000, now estimated to cost $6,000,000, and before they get through it will probably cost $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, and will offer opportunity for the development of not less than 200,000 horsepower. It is a great industrial proposition. Should we for one moment dispose of that, one of the chief elements of property belonging to the Blackfoot Tribe, without having particular and due regard to their needs, to their conditions, to their wishes, and to their rights? Who can say what effect this bill would have if applied to that project in respect to the future prosperity and welfare of the Indians whose property it is? The great principle to-day underlying the management of Indian affairs, that at last all those handling such affairs have come to recognize, is to teach the Indian how to be self-supporting, put into his own hands means for handling his own property as quickly as you can with safety, and thereafter hold him up as an independent working citizen. You make paupers by treating men as paupers. You cut off opportunities for independent development and progress when you hold in trust a man's property and peddle out to him annuities. These great properties belonging to the Indians, if tied up in this way in the hands of the United States, without the Indians ever having an opportunity to say anything about their management, anything about what shall be done with the proceeds, anything about the parties that shall be permitted to make these leases, will take from them their best incentive to development and to progress.

Now, one thing further, Mr. Chairman. I do not know just what the committee that produced this bill considered. The committee is composed of very distinguished gentlemen, headed by one of the most distinguished and most amiable Members in this House, but I am somewhat appalled when I think that his committee has inserted in this paragraph a provision saying that a lease shall be made for 50 years and then what shall be done after the expiration of that period, when every particle of these lands, excepting in the Territory of Alaska, is within the sacred confines of a State. Can it be that the members of the committee forgot that there are sovereign States composing the United States?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like two or three minutes more. I do not like to encroach on the time of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, I would like to ask if we can have some understanding as to time. I ask unanimous consent to close debate at the expiration of 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent to close debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto in 30 minutes——

Mr. FERRIS. And that I have control of the time, so that I may yield to the various gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that he be recognized for 30 minutes on this amendment and all amendments thereto——

Mr. FERRIS. And debate close at the end of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. And debate close at the end of that time. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. I have no objection if I can have five of those minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. The public lands to be affected by this bill are all within the confines of sovereign States. All Indian reservations to-day are within the confines of sovereign States. It does seem to me that the committee which prepared this bill overlooked the fact that there have ever existed such things as State rights, and I do not use those words in a technical or in a flippant sense. I use them in a most serious sense.

There has never been a time, so far as I know, when it has been proposed that the United States Government had the authority to regulate the internal business carried on in a State—business that is not interstate business. That is exactly what this bill does. This bill says that in the State of Wisconsin, for example, where there are many Indian reservations, some public land, and many water powers, a lease can be made for but 50 years, when the laws of the State of Wisconsin say they can be made forever, under certain regulations. Now, who is going to control? Absolutely the laws of the State of Wisconsin are going to control.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not think that the laws of the State of Wisconsin or the laws of any other State have very much to do with the regulation of water power located on public lands, does he?

Mr. MILLER. I undertake to say that the United States Government has no power whatever to regulate the rights, the methods of transmission, the stock, the bonds, the business operations of a water-power company in the State of Wisconsin, whether on public or private land, if it is not engaged in interstate business; and if it is so engaged, then only in so far as it is engaged in interstate business.

Mr. FERRIS. Right on that point the gentleman is at right angles with all the authorities on the subject.

Mr. MILLER. I think I can convince the gentleman from Oklahoma, if he will yield me 15 minutes, that in my contention I am on all fours with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I do not care if the gentleman is in disagreement.

Now, there are many Indian reservations in the State of Arizona. About one-third of the land in the State of Arizona, or about 40 per cent of the land, is in Indian reservations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman remember that in the State of Washington, in the great Quinaielt Indian Reservation the entire rapids rise and have their mouth in the Indian reservation?

Mr. MILLER. Yes. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. The Indians have been gradually driven—although I do not like to express that thought—into the inner and more inaccessible mountain regions of the States where they are located. We find them in the interior, in the mountains that have been given to them. They have great water-power systems on their land.

I mentioned the State of Arizona a few moments ago, a State that, in order to be developed, must find its development along the lines of irrigation, mining, and forestry. It is a State that has great possibilities. The Indian lands in the State are to play a very important part in the development of that State.

Now, truly if we are to legislate in relation to these enormous properties, fundamental to the Indian's life and future prospects, we ought to consider that legislation from the Indian's standpoint. But not one moment's time, so far as I am informed, has ever been given to the consideration of the different parts of this bill from the Indian's standpoint. And, Mr. Chairman, while I do not think that the language as now used in the bill includes Indian reservations, yet if there are gentlemen whose opinions I respect who do think it does, let us cut it out. Let us treat these Indians' property from the Indian's standpoint. Let us give them consideration on their own merits, having in mind their own purposes. We can legislate for our own property as we please, but when it comes to tieing up forever property belonging to our wards; when it comes to violating the laws of the States in respect to the property rights of our wards, let us halt our efforts and stop. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is regrettable—the spirit shown by some Members in their earnest desire, as I have no doubt, to improve this bill. It is regrettable that they should be inclined, judging by their manner, to attribute ignorance and lack of judgment to the committee, and not merely to the committee, but to the present Secretary of the Interior and to the previous Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fisher, under President Taft, and to the preceding Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Garfield, under President Roosevelt. They have all been before this committee and sanctioned this bill.

Now I want to speak a word with reference to the Indians. There are nearly 30,000 Indians on different reservations in the State of New Mexico. I have lived there for a good many years. I can look back and remember when we first started the Indian schools for the improvement of the status of the Indians, so that when the young Indians left school they would be examples to their fellow Indians. I remember the fact that I came to this Congress with the earnest desire to get Congress to grant more school facilities to the Indians. The anxiety of the boys and the girls to get into school has increased to an astounding extent. It is a fact that now when they get out of school the girls go into domestic service and remain. They get into the millinery shops and into the stores. They find that they are catching step with our civilization. It is the same way with the boys. They avail themselves of the education they have had and gladly become carpenters, for instance, and followers of a vocation.

Now, here is an act which is backed by men who have had charge of the Indians for decades past and who know what they are trying to do; an act which is backed by the experts, and backed by every man who has an Indian in his State at home. Here is a bill particularly designed and intended to help the Indians, and the Indians are growing in appreciation of the fact that we desire to help them. Many of them raise corn and wheat. Many of them have goats and sheep and horses. I have seen Navajo Indians with two or three hundred ponies, driving them through the streets of a town; driving them up and down the street and offering them for sale.

Here is a proposition to make the waters useful, now too costly to be used; and yet you talk about it as a crime or as a very great impropriety, or, at least an improper act on our part, to urge this bill—we who know personally these things and who want to put the matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who will protect the Indians, as the former Secretaries of the Interior have done all along.

He will protect them from abuses of even a 50-year lease. The honorable gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], whom I respect greatly for his ability and sincerity, has referred to tying up these poor Indians under a 50-year lease. Another thing that is spoken of is that these leases will be to great corporations. The fact is that nine-tenths of the leases will be for the working of small enterprises by a few men. A man will construct a dam in some canyon to carry on a mining operation with cheap electric water power. He will run one small mill, perhaps, to work the ores taken out of a mine. The Secretary of the Interior can not make a lease for longer than 50 years. That large discretion is for the benefit of great enterprises that will take millions of dollars to put them on their feet, because the capitalists must be given sufficient time to enable them to see that they can get their money back. But the most of these leases will be for small enterprises, to develop some rich valley by sinking wells and pumping water for farming purposes, 500 feet if necessary, with cheap hydro-electric power. Why, my friends, the intention of everybody back of this bill was to help the Indians. They are under the guardianship of the Secretary of the Interior all the time, and we have been endeavoring to protect and elevate them as and into useful citizens. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, generally speaking, I favor this bill. I believe it is a good bill. I believe it means the development and use of the water power on the public lands. Now, if it is good for the forest reserves, by what kind of reasoning is it bad for the Indian reservations? If this system of developing the water power on the forest reserves of the West will serve beneficially the interests of the people of the West, the people who go into the forest reserves and the people who live near the forest reserves, by what kind of reasoning can it be possible that this same bill will not beneficially serve the interests of the people who live in and near Indian reservations and who are interested in Indian reservations? You say "the poor Indian." And you worry about the poor Indian. Why do you worry any more about the poor Indian in the Indian reservations than you do about the poor white man or the poor black man, or any other poor man who has an interest in the forest reserves? Do you mean to say that you are going to inflict upon the forest reserves something that is injurious, but that you want to protect the Indians from any such kind of punishment?

The truth is there is nothing injurious about this bill. It is beneficial to the interests of the forest reserves and those who are interested in the forest reserves. That being so, it is beneficial to people who live in and are interested in the Indian reservations. A few moments ago we heard my able friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] suggest that it affected the proposition of State rights, and he made the usual earnest plea that is made on behalf of State rights, arguing that the State was going to be oppressed.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. What reason can be given why the Indian lands should be permitted to remain idle and the water go to waste? Can any reason be given why that should be done?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course no reason can be given why the water power on Indian lands should be measured by a different test than the water power on other public lands.

But it has been suggested that the State jurisdiction is affected. Gentlemen turn from the poor Indian to the poor State. It is said that the State of Wisconsin gives a perpetual lease, but the United States Government is only going to give one for 50 years, and they ask you if this Government can assert its authority to limit a Federal lease to 50 years when the State of Wisconsin in certain cases gives a 100-year lease or a perpetual lease. Of course the Government can establish its own regulations. What the poor Indian needs, what the poor white man needs, and what the public needs is complete control and some kind of definite rule for the development of this water power that will mean something, that will make it subject to use, and yet will not part with the title.

It is suggested that these things ought to be put in the hands of the poor Indian, and that he ought to be allowed to make these leases. I suppose no doubt you could get him to give a lease for eternity and then another eternity in addition. Perhaps a lease of the State of Wisconsin would be only for eternity, but an Indian lease would be a double eternity. We do not want to leave it in the hands of the Indians. The Indian is perfectly willing to rely upon the Government of the United States if it will retain some kind of effective control under some kind of definite rule.

These gentlemen do not love the poor Indian half as much as they think they love him. They want the timber, they want the water power, and they do not want the strong hand of the Government to lay down the conditions and the terms; but I believe the terms laid down by the Federal Government will be fair, and I stand for that very kind of thing. The people of the West stand for it, too. We are not worried about the Federal Government having the power to run things on the public domain rather than the State. They would rather have the Federal Government run things owned by the Nation, as they are running them in the Federal reserves in the State of Washington, than to have such things run by Federal troops, like the Federal Government is running them on Rockefeller's privately owned lands in Colorado. We would rather the hand of the Federal Government should be firm. We would rather you would make rules that mean something. We want the use of our reserves and the Federal resources our there, but we are perfectly willing to abide by the decent rules of the game. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], I will yield to him four minutes. That is cutting him out of one minute, but I want to use that minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, because it has been the policy of our Government to protect the Indian in the preserves found on the Indian reservations, such as the forests and everything that is found on their reservations, I believe we should except water powers on these Indian reservations to see first whether this plan is going to be successful and favorable to our Indians. The water power on the Indian reservations belongs to the Indians. It does not belong to the people of the United States or of the respective States. Those reservations are their property, and we are but the guardians of the Indians for that purpose.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield now. The bill under consideration is predicated upon the idea that the water power on the public lands should be available for the residents of the State where the water power is found. That should not be the principle so far as the water power that is contained on Indian reservations is concerned.

The water power on the public lands should be leased under such terms as would supply power to the public generally at the lowest possible cost; but the water power, as far as the Indian reservations are concerned, belongs to the Indians, and it is for them to determine its use and the conditions of its disposal. We know from the history of the appropriation of water powers in Canada and in the States, where there were no restrictions whatever, that as soon as this bill goes into effect every available, practical water power will be seized upon by persons who are desirous of laying claim to the future development of water power. If we could possibly restrict the application and enforcement of this bill to one-half of the undeveloped water powers on the public domain, it would be well to try it out as an experiment, to see whether it would protect the interests of the residents of those States. It would be well to reserve some of that water power for the future; but no, we are going pell-mell and opening up all of the water powers at once. I say that, so far as the Indian reservations are concerned, even if we consider the plan that is proposed here to be workable, it would be good policy not to include the water power on the Indian reservations, because, even if we have complete control over them, the Indians have certain rights to be considered.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it not true that one of two things must happen—if the Indian reservations are cut out from this, then the water remains in idleness and flows idly to the sea, or the Indian Bureau will get up a separate bill to do the same thing?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, allow them to remain in idleness until you develop this proposition and see whether the proposed plan will be workable; and, furthermore, the water should be reserved for the benefit of the Indians and should not be leased merely for the benefit of the residents outside of the reservations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think there must be some surprise in the mind of everyone who has read this bill over the proposition that it includes Indian reservations. Certainly such an important application of the bill ought to have been made plain by its terms. But, no; there is only the general statement here, "and other reservations." There are, of course, many public reservations of land; but that which is peculiar to Indian reservations is the fact that Indian reservations are held, not by the Government of the United States unreservedly subject to its control, subject to the interests primarily of the people of the United States, but the lands that are held in Indian reservations are held, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] said, subject to the limitation or obligation or incumbrance, if you choose to call it such, that they are held in trust, not for the people of the United States but for the Indians themselves. Certainly it is not too much to ask that an important measure so vitally affecting their interests be considered separately and apart from these other questions. I am ready to meet and to consider, and other gentlemen are ready to meet and to consider, the question of what is to the best interest of the Indians with regard to their reservations, but it ought not to be mingled with or affected by entirely different interests and conditions. The cynical indifference that is displayed here by gentlemen who advocate this inclusion with regard to the rights of Indians is no surprise to the people of the United States. It has marked and stained the record of legislation through the century that we have had to deal with the Indians. They have been driven from their lands. They have been forced to submit to conditions and impositions that have brought to them not only material loss, but suffering and misery extreme and utterly unnecessary.

The history of our treatment of the Indians from the beginning is not one that we look upon with pride by any means, and to-day we are asked to add another instance which is expressive of our indifference and contempt. These Indians, who have been driven from their own lands to these reservations in the extremities of the land, where the white man does not care to go or can not live, in the canyons, among the mountains, in the forests remote from civilization, are not safe even there. We are asked by this bill to allow the speculator and the promoter to enter even these remote fastnesses and to take from them their water power and subject all their interests to the promotion of enterprises in which they will have no possible benefit. In any instance when a project is under consideration under the operations of this bill it will be other interests that will control. Mr. Chairman, it is clearly our duty to consider such propositions separately. I can conceive of no reason why it ought not to be done, so that then we may determine the question, not in connection with other lands, not with regard primarily to the selfish interests of other people, not with regard even to the interests of the United States as a Nation, but primarily with regard to the Indians themselves. We boast of being a humanitarian and generous people, but the cynical indifference that we exercise with regard to our operations with and our obligations to the Indians ought not to be emphasized again by this act on this day. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will be adopted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I should be of opinion that a fair construction of the language of the bill would not include within its provisions Indian reserves, but I understand the Secretary of the Interior, who is to administer the law, considers it does include Indian reserves, and therefore the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota should be adopted. We do not as a people own these Indian lands. They belong to the Indians. Excluding these lands from this bill does not tie up the water power on the Indian lands. It would simply leave them in this position, that when there was any need of development on the Indian reservations the matter would be brought to Congress, and Congress, probably after consultation with the Indians and inquiry as to their needs, would make proper provision for the development. If the enterprise were approved, they might be brought under this bill. As a matter of fact, it is a question whether we have any right to bring the Indian under the terms of this bill without his consent. It might be possible that the Secretary of the Interior would believe that it would be well to utilize the waters on an Indian reservation for the development of power to be carried hundreds of miles away. The Indians might believe it was better to use that power for pumping water for the irrigation of their land, and the Indians' view of it ought to be considered by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I again repeat what I said before. If the Committee on Indian Affairs and the House should decree otherwise, there would be no feeling at all about the matter, because it is a matter of policy, of course, whether or not we should leave the Indian lands in idleness and let the school reserves be nonsupporting and in idleness or whether we should try to give them an effective method of developing water power for their own benefit. Some things have been said that ought not to be said in fairness. It has been said that it is an attempt to strip the Indian of all he has. On the contrary, this is the very best effort in good faith to try to help the Indian.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield; I have only a few minutes, in which I wish to cover three or four points. All over the country we have school reserves of three or four sections of land lying there in absolute idleness, in absolute waste. Why? Because, perchance, they are not near by to anybody who has a disposition to develop them. Does anybody here think that a blanket Indian has business ability sufficient to develop water power in his own right? Does anybody here think that a blanket Indian knows enough to develop water power to irrigate their school reserves and make them supporting? Surely not. So, inasmuch as the Interior Department is the head of the department, inasmuch as the Indian Bureau is under the Interior Department, inasmuch as I have a letter here from the Indian Commissioner and from the Secretary of the Interior, both wanting the Indian lands put in here, so that we can help improve the Indians and let them avail themselves of the possibilities of the reservations, surely no one will say that we are stripping the Indians of all they have.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will let me proceed. I have only a few minutes and I have several things I desire to say. If it was the purpose that we were going to strip the Indians of their all, certainly my own welfare, political as otherwise, would demand that I stand on only one side, and that would be on the side of the Indians, because in my State nearly half of all the Indians of the Republic live, and in my State they vote and hold office and have power. I hold in my hand a telegram from the governor of my own State, I hold in my hand a telegram from the governor of Montana, I hold in my hand a telegram from the governors of Wyoming and New Mexico and Washington, and of most of these Western States, urging that legislation be passed and that the water power of the West be developed. Some of the gentlemen of the West who are railing against this bill are railing against their own interests; they are unwittingly trying to let the intrenched water powers have a monopoly by the nondevelopment of water power that is now in the West going to waste. No one regards the interests of the West more than I; surely no one is a better friend of the West than Secretary Lane. He is the most untiring worker for your welfare I have ever met.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield in the limited time I have. I do not desire to be discourteous to any gentleman, but I regret I can not in the limited time I have. Secretary Lane is trying to do more for the West than they can do for themselves, and the gentleman from Minnesota, good lawyer that he is and amiable gentleman that he is, laid down a legal proposition a while ago that I fear will not stand up. The Chandler-Dunbar case makes waste paper of all such debate and all such arguments and all such fundamental propositions as he lays down. What on earth has the State to do with Federal Government property? Nothing; and no one can controvert that. Many gentlemen here are asserting the State can develop it itself, and so forth. To my mind that means that nothing will be done, because the State has no power to do anything with our property. The argument of the gentleman from Minnesota has been abandoned by most of the good lawyers, and I think he will be driven to a like conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER) there were—ayes 20, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move, page 1, line 11, to strike out the words "and other property."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the words "and other property."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I assume the gentleman would be willing for us to accept the amendment. I think that amendment should go in, after conferring with the members of the committee present.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert before the word "lands," in the same line, the word "public."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, before the word "lands," insert the word "public."

Mr. MANN. I take it that the gentleman thinks that would be proper language?

Mr. FERRIS. I think it would be.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 3, line 5, all after the word "permittee" down to the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out all of the section after the word "permittee" in line 5.

Mr. MANN. I ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The words to be stricken out are:

"The tenure of the proposed lease and the charges or rentals to be collected thereunder to be specified in said preliminary permit, and such permittee upon filing an application for lease prior to the expiration of the permit period shall be entitled to a preference right to lease the lands embraced in the permit upon the terms, conditions, and limitations authorized by this act."

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield just a moment——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I followed the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very carefully in his general speech the other day, and I have in mind what he said; and, feeling the advisability of doing what he thought, I called at the department and talked with them about it no longer ago than this morning, and they thought they could pretty well accomplish under the regulations all we could accomplish under this; and I have little or no objection, so far as I am concerned, and I do not think the committee has.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question. The proviso at the bottom of page 2 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a temporary permit to an applicant. Would there be any objection in the gentleman's mind to changing that so that the Secretary might issue a temporary permit to more than one applicant for investigation of the same place? In other words, instead of saying "an applicant," as in line 21, to say "applicants"; and then, in line 24, to strike out the letter "a" and insert the word "permits" instead of "permit," so that the Secretary would have authority to make regulations in order that more than one man or more than one concern might investigate the power possibilities of a particular place?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I really think there is an objection to the gentleman's suggestion which I think the gentleman will agree to when I call his attention to what I have in mind. It was called to my attention by engineers that sometimes an expenditure aggregating a million or more dollars was necessary in order to make preliminary survey on watersheds and waterfalls to determine whether or not the thing was feasible. Again, it was called to my attention by the water-power people, and department officers as well, that they had to go and buy up already acquired water rights that had been filed under the State law as a part and parcel of the going concern to be. It was also called to our attention in the hearings—and the hearings are quite full on that point—in order that this be effective and operative that you give some one an opportunity for a short period of time, at least—we thought a year was sufficient, and if the gentleman thinks that is too long we can change it——

Mr. MANN. I have not any objection to the time.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that if you allow them to go out and issue a permit to two applicants either one of them would be unwilling to make the expenditure required unless they thought they could be sure to get the lease.

Mr. MANN. Here is what I wish to call to the attention of the gentleman: The right of a department to make personal favorites is always a dangerous right to confer. We do not let a department buy property without advertising for bids. We do not let them dispose of property without advertising for bids. We do not let them sell waste iron without advertising for bids. Now, here comes along two men, each of whom thinks there are great possibilities in a water power. They both apply to the Secretary of the Interior for a permit, and it is purely a matter of favoritism as to which one gets the permit. That would be conferring a power upon the Secretary which, if he exercises, might lead to charges made against him whether they are true or false.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield right there, the gentleman states the condition fairly and as it is, and it is a condition that is present and has to be met, but let me suggest to the gentleman that under the revocable permit law of 1901, under which we are now operating and under which a good deal of water power has been developed, they have the same right there.

Mr. MANN. And that is being repealed by this provision.

Mr. FERRIS. True, but the real complaint that is bringing about the repeal, as shown by the authorities who appeared before us, was that the Secretary of the Interior, without a hearing, could revoke it; could cut them off and take it away.

Mr. MANN. That no one would take it.

Mr. FERRIS. That no one would take it, and he could cut their heads off without a chance to be heard and no one would feel safe to develop under such a law.

Mr. MANN. But if you give the Secretary of the Interior authority to make general regulation, he can cover that question. For instance, the Geological Survey, in its investigation, discovers the potentialities of water power at some place. They communicate that information, or some one does to some friend, and he makes an application. It may be worth a great deal of money. No one else can get in. Now, ought not the Secretary of the Interior to have the authority to permit more than one person to make this examination, so that you really preserve the interests of the Government? He can make his general regulations. The language of the bill would confine it, I think, to one applicant at a place. No one else can investigate. It may be water power worth millions of dollars. The gentleman spoke of their spending a million or more dollars at a place in a preliminary survey. In such a case the water power is vastly valuable——

Mr. FERRIS. Very true.

Mr. MANN. Why not leave it so that the Secretary can make regulations and can permit under proper regulations more than one concern or person to make a preliminary examination as to the possibilities of the future?

Mr. FERRIS. I confess I can not see great objections to the suggestions of the gentleman other than——

Mr. MANN. I want to vote for this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I know the gentleman does, and we need the help of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. While the gentleman is discussing the proviso, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if in granting this preliminary permit it is intended, in granting the permit, to authorize the occupation of lands that are within Indian reservation, and I call his attention to the language on page 2, lines 24 and 25.

Mr. FERRIS. I did not get the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The suggestion is that if this bill is intended to apply to Indian reservations, does this proviso authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a permit authorizing the occupation of lands in Indian reservations?

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly it would.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Public lands?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no doubt if there was a feasible project on an Indian reservation the Secretary of the Interior would permit a company to go out and ascertain if it was a feasible proposition. Otherwise you would never get it developed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think it is a permit authorizing the occupation of public land for water-power development.

Mr. MANN. I think the words "public land" would be construed in connection with the former part of the act where it says, "public lands, including Indian reservations." I hope the gentleman will agree to this amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not object to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 21, page 2, the word "an" and to make the word "applicant" plural.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, strike out the word "an" and make the word "applicant" plural.

Mr. MANN. And also at the same time, in line 24, strike out the word "a" and pluralize the word "permit."

The Clerk read as follows:

And in line 24, strike out the word "a" and pluralize the word "permit."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Would those amendments involve the changing of the last word on line 5 of page 3, from "permittee" to "permittees"?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; because "permittee" refers to each one of the permittees, and each one would be extended under the general regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "public," the first word on line 25 of page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 2, line 25, strike out the word "public."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the chairman and members of the committee to the fact that, as the section has been amended, it covers public lands, reserved and unreserved, and forest reserves which are not public lands, and reservations, and the word "public" at this point ought to go out of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming is a good one. No one would want to put in a word that would limit the amendment that we have agreed to. I hope the gentleman's amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "lease" and insert the word "grant," and in line 10, after the word "thereof," insert "the right of way over."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, not with the expectation that it will be adopted, for I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] shakes his head, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] catches the suggestion. I realize that these amendments would vitally change the character of this act, and change it so as to make it conform with our legislation on these subjects in the past, and in such a way as to make the bill really useful in the development of water powers on the public domain.

The adoption of this amendment would not affect anything that might follow in regard to the requirements relative to regulation and control of charges, but it would change the character of the right from that of a mere lease to that of a grant of a right of way. It would give permanence to the grant made, and, in my opinion, it would be very much more likely to insure development than the bill as it stands. The development being based on a permanent right, the power could be developed and furnished to the people more cheaply than it will be under a limited right with uncertain charges.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I very much hope that no considerable portion of the House will think seriously of adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming. I think the views of the House are pretty well ironed out, and I believe the views of the country are in strong support of them. I believe that no one wants to grant or even talk about granting away the fee to water-power sites in this country. I feel that it is our greatest resource in this country. I feel that in importance it towers above coal, above oil and gas, and that we ought to lease for a limited period of time only the water powers of the country, so that we may get development, and in the end get them back for the benefit of the public and for the benefit of the Government and for the benefit of the people who will ultimately enjoy them. The amendment of the gentleman would change the entire purport of the bill, and I hope it will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "than," strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty-five."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I feel that there are grave responsibilities resting upon the House with reference to placing these great powers in the hands of those who may hereafter lease them, or those who have already developed water powers.

In reading over some of the franchises which have been granted by this country and other countries I have discovered that this provision in this bill, and in the Adamson bill, which passed the House a few days ago, goes further than anything which I have read in modern times. Canada leases her water power, or the right to generate hydroelectric power, for a period of 20 years. The Federal reserve act, which we passed during this Congress, grants a franchise for 20 years only. The great majority of the franchises which are granted to our street railways in cities and to our electric-light plants and other franchises of a similar character are usually limited to 20 years.

The proposition in this bill is to grant this water-power franchise for a term of 50 years, nearly twice the average life of man. It seems to me that we are now working upon one of the greatest problems that affect the rights of the people of this country. It may be made very beneficial and useful to all, or it may be made very useful and beneficial to a few and exceedingly oppressive and detrimental to the many. If the water power of this country should pass into the hands of the few, and that few should undertake to use that power as they have used other special rights in this country, undoubtedly the people would suffer in the future.

We have an example of what the few do when they get control. The Sugar Trust of the country is giving us an example of trust power, as to what can be done when an opportunity is afforded. We have seen the price of sugar forced up a cent a day until I understand to-day it is selling at 10 cents a pound, on the theory that there is a disturbance in the east, and that the people will tolerate such increases under such a plea. There is no more reason or excuse for the increase in the price of sugar now than there was three months ago, and what is now being done is an exhibition of arbitrary power.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FITZGERALD). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think that the Sugar Trust would have any such power over the price of sugar if the United States had developed the beet-sugar industry, so that it could furnish the home supply?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, I wonder if we can not agree as to time. I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto at the end of 20 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to offer an amendment, either to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] or later.

Mr. FERRIS. I am only asking to close debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto, but not to close debate on the section.

Mr. MONDELL. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] should prevail, would that prevent an amendment to strike out all reference to the limit?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all, as I understand the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed——

Mr. FERRIS. In 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. In 30 minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the understanding was that I should have 10 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will not ask for that.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not propose to take any more time after that on this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I will have to modify my request and make it 35 minutes, then.

Mr. MONDELL. I am perfectly willing to discuss my amendment as an amendment offered to that offered by the gentleman from Illinois, but I should like to have 10 minutes on this proposition, either now or later. I will move to strike out the limitation.

Mr. FERRIS. Then let us make this limitation on both amendments. I ask unanimous consent to close debate at the end of 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to close debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that applies only to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]?

Mr. FERRIS. And amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], I desire to say that he has always been to me a very interesting Member of Congress, and I presume he has been interesting to all. I regard him as one of the most careful, painstaking, and thorough investigating of the membership of this House. [Applause.] Whatever he undertakes, it has been my observation that he is prompted by the purest motives, and whenever he propounds a question to me it appeals to my sense of honor and decency to reply honestly and conscientiously. He asks if I believe that if the United States had prepared for the protection of beet sugar in America the Sugar Trust would have been able to increase the price of sugar so radically and so persistently as it is doing to-day? That question demands a fair and candid answer. I do not believe that the gentleman wants to deal with this question lightly, and I presume he refers to the late tariff bill, by which sugar is ultimately to be placed in the free list. If I am not correct, I desire him to correct me.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, my question was this: I did not say anything about the tariff. I said, "Does the gentleman think that if the United States had developed the beet-sugar industry so that it could supply the home demand for sugar, the Sugar Trust would have had any such power to manipulate sugar prices as it has to-day?"

Mr. FOWLER. That question can be answered yes and no. If in America we had the beet-sugar industry developed to such an extent that it would supply our demands, and the control of it were in the hands of the many, then there would be no trouble about it, and it would be impossible to increase the price systematically; but if it should pass into the hands of the few, as it is to-day, then it would matter not whether sugar was produced in America or abroad. We have an example of that in the case of coffee. Coffee is produced abroad, yet it is in the hands of a trust. I recollect when I was a boy 2 pounds of Arbuckle's roasted coffee was retailed for 15 cents. That was the weapon with which they wiped out all the handlers of coffee until it went into a trust, and now I pay 35 to 40 cents a pound for coffee for my wife. I do not drink it myself and never did. I know the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is honest in his convictions about these matters. What is true of sugar and coffee will be true of the water power of this country if it gets into the hands of men of this class. My colleagues, I shudder, not for myself but for my country, if the water power should pass into the hands of the few so that by its cheapness all other people will be driven out of business who do not have access to it, and when all of the money-making business of this country passes into the hands of the few. If you give it to them for 50 years, I shudder for the people of this country. I trust that we are not now sewing buckles on shackles for human limbs; but it appears to me that a 50-year lease is the strongest shackle, with the most complete buckle and lock that the Congress could possibly make by law. I trust that the people of this country will never be placed in the position that it appears to me I can see them in if the water power should pass into the hands of the few, and then they should secure complete control of it and the business operated by it, as they are doing now with the products of common use in this country.

There is only one relief that I can see, and that is the relief that might be obtained from electricity and air, for unlike other things they are so free and abundant that they can not be taken from us. Water by gravitation runs away from us, and wood and coal burn up when used for power purposes, but air and electricity stay with us forever and are never reduced in quantity and force by their use. The ingenuity of man, if we are placed under the condition that I think we might be by granting away this right for 50 years, may afford relief by some useful invention whereby we may be able to snatch from the air its great power and apply it as a propelling power for the wheels of industry, and we may be able to grab from the skies the electricity for the purpose of applying it also to the wheels of progress and of business.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Does the gentleman believe that the water-power industries in the United States are not now in the hands of the monopolies and trusts?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is another one of those conscientious men on the floor of this House. While I am not as familiar with the different water-power projects over the country as some other men are, because there are none of them in my locality and only one, as I recollect, in my State, yet wherever water power has been harnessed it has gone into the hands of an oppressive monopoly, so far as I am able to learn.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. That being true, will we control it by lengthening or shortening the time of the grant or the lease?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; we can do that, because it will revert to the State more readily and more often, so that those who get the control of it can not oppress us unmercifully for not only a lifetime but forever.

Mr. Chairman, this water power, in my opinion, is one of the most useful. I would not retard its use to man. It has lain unused for ages in America, yet it is one of the most useful and, I believe, the cheapest power within our reach. But in providing for its use I would not place it in such a condition that it can not be reclaimed to the country. I would not place it out of the reach of the common people. You know, all of you—and I am not speaking from a political or partisan standpoint—that after the passage of the Dingley bill within five years all of the great money-making businesses went into the hands of a few monopolies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out "for a period not longer than 50 years."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill as it stands provides for the granting of these leases for a period of 50 years. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] offers to amend by making the period 25 years. I propose to strike out all reference to the period of the lease, leaving the bill so it will provide for an irrevocable lease. As a matter of fact, the bill as it stands is, to my mind, conflicting in that it provides for a 50-year lease, and a few lines farther down for an irrevocable lease. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois in the best of faith——

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman construe that word "irrevocable" to mean that a lease would not terminate within a definite period named in it?

Mr. MONDELL. I am frank to say that I do not know how to interpret it. I think it would bear the interpretation the gentleman suggests.

Mr. CULLOP. I agree that that clause which contains the word "irrevocable" ought to go out of the bill; but I wanted to know what the construction of the gentleman from Wyoming was of the word "irrevocable," from the manner in which he has spoken of it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want any false impression to get started about it. There is a section which specifically says that for any breach of contract they can go into the court and have their rights cut off.

Mr. CULLOP. This same section provides:

Which leases shall be irrevocable, except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield, but really my time is running. I think the section is somewhat conflicting, but I am not raising that question now. My proposition is this: These leases ought to be irrevocable except for violation of their terms and for these reasons: The gentleman from Illinois in good faith offered an amendment shortening the time. In the interest of whom? He said in the interest of the people. How on earth are the people going to be benefited by brief leases? Everybody knows that a corporation or a municipality undertaking one of these enterprises would be fully justified—in fact, as a business proposition it would be necessary—in amortizing their enterprise within the period of the lease. Under the terms of the bill, the lease ending in 50 years, they would be justified, and any public-service commission would necessarily recognize their right, in obtaining a complete and full return on the investment within the life of the lease. The result would be that the users of the power would be compelled to pay not only a reasonable return to the power company as interest upon the investment but to pay for the entire plant also within the period of the lease. The bill says every 50 years. The gentleman from Illinois would have the people pay for it every 25 years, from some curious notion that in so doing we would give the people the benefit of cheap water power.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. Making a lease continuous does not prevent the adoption of provisions for a periodical readjustment of the charges to be made, if any, upon the enterprise. It does not take from the people any power of control whatever, but does take from the operator the opportunity to claim the right to receive within every period of the lease not only a fair return upon the investment but a complete return of the capital. It will be argued, of course, that at the end of the 50 years under the terms of this bill, if the property is taken over by the Federal Government, the Federal Government is to pay something for it. Just how much is not clear. Also, if it is leased to others they must pay for it, but just how much it is not clear. But those provisions are not a complete protection of the investment, and the result would be that the investor would be justified and would be held by the court to be justified in adding to his charge above what was necessary to cover a fair interest rate an additional rate to provide for the final wiping out of the capital invested within the period of the lease.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the time has been limited.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood I was to have 10 minutes, but I did not ask for it when I first rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming believe that there will ever be a recovery of the property if it passes into the hands of a corporation for a period of 50 years?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know of any reason why there should be a recovery of the property. I have never been able to adopt the philosophy of the gentlemen who imagine that the Government should retain some special right, other than the right of sovereign eminent domain which it has, to recover these properties. What are these properties built for? They are built to serve the people. What is the interest of the people in them? The interest of all the people is to get this service at the best rates, at the lowest prices.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any more reason——

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield further.

Mr. FOWLER. One more question is all I wanted to ask.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, the gentleman does not serve the people by placing added burdens on enterprises. He does not serve the people by shortening the life of the lease and giving those people who have put their money in the enterprise an opportunity, at least an excuse, to charge a higher rate because the life of the lease is brief. The interest of the people in these enterprises is to have them perpetually operated at all times, and until the end of time, under proper public control in order that the people using the product may not be charged an unfair and exorbitant price. Now, the way to make those charges low, to have them as low as possible, is to relieve them from burdens, to relieve them from breaks in the continuity of the enterprise and establish it on a solid foundation on which it may run on at the least cost. I am utterly unable to grasp the philosophy of gentlemen who imagine that they are going to help the people, whose only interest is cheap power, by breaking the continuity of the enterprises and by loading them down with heavy charges. Shorten the term of the lease, the greater the burden on the people for amortization charges.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman know of any corporation that does that now?

Mr. MONDELL. Any corporation that does what?

Mr. BAILEY. That gives the service without wringing a tribute from the people. I do not happen to know of such.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman want me to understand that there is no effective public control anywhere in the United States? Is that the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. BAILEY. There is a great struggle I think.

Mr. MONDELL. If we are a lot of pusillanimous folks everywhere under this flag that we can not protect ourselves from public-service corporations, why, a statute written on the Federal statute books will not save us. If we have not virtue enough, the people of those States and communities, to protect ourselves from our own local corporations, we certainly can not be protected by putting burdens on enterprise. The gentleman seems to proceed on the theory that the way to protect ourselves from exorbitant charges is to lay burdens on power enterprises. We want cheap power. We want rates controlled. The best way to get cheap power is to give continuity of tenure. The water rights are perpetual. If now you make a lease 50 years you simply give the lessee the opportunity to claim that it should secure full return of its investment as well as interest on it. That is placing a burden on the users that is not justified.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has not answered the question.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield further. The gentleman did not ask a question that anyone could answer. I am frank to say I did not understand the gentleman's question. My proposition is that shortening the period of these leases makes a charge to the people that use the product greater. There is no escape from it. There is no getting away from it. If the lease were 10 years the burden on the people using the product would be still greater.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] adopts one extreme; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is not exactly on the other extreme, but he is very near it. I understand the operations of the mind of the gentleman from Illinois, because when I first began to go into this proposition like he is doing now I halted at the proposition to make the possible limit of a lease as long as 50 years, but after hearing the men who have studied this question, men of the greatest eminence—Cabinet officers and ex-Cabinet officers—and after considering the arguments pro and con, I am now firmly satisfied that the possible limit ought not to be less than 50 years. That does not mean that all of these franchises are going to be granted for 50 years. There may be one granted for a shorter term, believed by the applicant to be sufficient, in a case where a man might want to develop a vein in a mine by the use of cheap hydroelectric power. There might be a case where a man would desire to saw timber in the forest and put it on the market; and in such a case he might desire a term for his lease for 10, for 15, or 20 years; and all of these things are to be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. Then there will be propositions presented on the great streams for getting water for irrigation, some of them costing millions of dollars. Now, we can not expect capitalists to go into an enterprise taking ten, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five million dollars without ample time certainly provided in the lease, provided they comply with the law, so long as they do not practice extortion on the poor people who are farming or mining who desire to procure this cheap hydroelectric power from the lessee. The lease may be canceled at any time for violation of its terms or the violation of any general regulation. It is not bound to stand for that 50 years. They will be under the supervision of the great Government of the United States, under men in high office. No difference what their politics may be, we can rely—we must rely—upon the patriotism, the integrity, and the wise discretion of men occupying such lofty official position.

So, my friends, in view of the fact that many enterprises will take great capital, we must make the inducement to men of large capital who are willing to abide by the terms of the franchises they are seeking. We must make it liberal, not only that they make as much as 6 per cent, a limit below which is unconstitutional, but make liberal terms, because electric power, if granted on a big enough scale, will be so cheap that we can afford that they make a fair return above 6 per cent and have the principal of the capital invested finally accrue. Nobody will object to that. Now, to cut it down to 25 years, as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, will practically shut out great bodies of capitalists who can erect these great works of development on a big scale. The first objection to taking away all limit to the lease is this, that it puts too much power beyond the reach of the laws of the people. We must provide for ultimate control in the Government. When the period of 50 years has elapsed, if they have observed the law, if they have furnished adequate and reasonable service, and practiced no oppression on the public, the Government should have the discretion lodged in the Secretary of the Interior to renew it on the same or altered terms, as the then existing conditions and circumstances should warrant.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSSON. I will.

Mr. GOOD. In fixing the rate for this bill, it would become a law with this limitation, that the Secretary, as I understand it, would have to fix a rate that would be high enough to permit the persons who put the money in the enterprise to earn a reasonable return to care for the rusting and wearing out of the property and for the replacement of the investment at the end of 50 years?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Not quite that; but still that they may be allowed, without any interference, to earn their 6 or more per cent. We must assume that the Secretary of the Interior is an honest, patriotic public servant who is fair to big capital and at the same time determined to protect the uses of the power. Nobody is waging war on big capital that is honest and is conserving the public weal. We have got to consider both interests, and the Secretary, at the end of 50 years, as well as during the intermediate time, should control and be able to punish any injustice to the public by evoking the franchise. Who can foretell what may be required at the end of 50 years; what economic developments may be coming? What seer 50 years ago would have dared to foretell the marvels of to-day of electrical facts existing all around us? The established facts of aviation?

The end of 50 years is a long way ahead. We are moving with startling rapidity in the civilization of the whole world, and our country bids fair, in view of the awful calamity taking place in the Old World at this moment, to be the only great Nation left to keep aloft the flag of peace and good will to all the world. [Applause.] The Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor, holding the flaming torch of civilization, may supply the light needed, in but a short time, maybe, to save the present civilization of the Old World from sinking into another Dark Ages, which followed the destruction of the civilization of Greece and Rome.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, speaking first to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming, and then to the amendment offered by my colleague, as I understand the views of these gentlemen, they are well-nigh opposite, as the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] has said. My colleague would limit these leases to 25 years, and the gentleman from Wyoming would take off the limit altogether and not place any maximum in the law, the idea being that 50 years may not be sufficient time to amortize some of these plants, as I understand him.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman perhaps did not clearly understand me. My proposition is that plants ought not to be amortized in 50 years, or in any such period, because it adds to the charge.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I understand. In answer to that I would say it seems to me that these plants, even if the lease was of a longer period than 50 years, would be amortized in the 50 years. I do not believe, for instance, that bonds will ever be issued on a proposition of this kind for a longer period than of 50 years. From the standpoint of an investor, people are not looking for that kind of an investment. They would prefer a 20-year, or 30-year, or even a 50-year bond, certainly, to one running longer than that time.

Mr. MANN. What is to become of the property at the end of the 50 years?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. At the end of the 50 years, under section 6, I believe it is, any one of three things can be done: It can be re-leased under such terms as may then be agreed upon to the same lessee; it may be taken from him by the Government; or it may be leased to a new lessee at the end of 50 years. That is my recollection.

Mr. MANN. It can not absolutely cease, can it?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. No. If the Government takes it over it must take it over at a valuation to be fixed as the bill provides it shall be fixed under section 5.

Mr. MANN. So that if there were bonds outstanding then they would still be a lien upon the property or the proceeds, I take it?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Certainly. And I will state further that the bill specifically authorizes the mortgaging of the property to such an extent as might be desired.

I want to speak, though, to the other end of this proposition, namely, to the original amendment, which is to the effect that these leases shall be limited to 25 years. When we started to consider this proposition in committee I felt somewhat as the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] says he did. I questioned seriously the advisability of giving as long leases as 50 years. But as I listened to those who came before the committee who had studied the problem from the points of view that they gave us, I felt that 50 years was not unreasonable. Certainly such men as Secretary Lane and former Secretary Fisher, of my own State, and Mr. Pinchot would yield to nobody in their desire to protect the interests of the people in problems of this kind; and I was extremely interested, when those gentlemen appeared before the committee to give their views, to find out what they were going to say to us with reference to this particular phase of the problem, namely, whether or not 50 years was too long a time and longer than should be expected and was reasonable. I was gratified to find them practically of one mind on that proposition, and, as I understood each of these men, they gave it to us as their opinion that 50 years was not too long a time.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question, briefly?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. What is the objection to an indeterminate lease, provided it is sufficiently safeguarded by revocation clauses so as to protect the rights of the people?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The main objection, as I recall it, was that a lease of that kind would preclude absolutely the community or the Government, whichever you want to call it, taking over this property at any time in the future, should conditions arise that would make it desirable to do so.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asked the question whether this property would ever be taken over under the terms of the lease. I have no doubt it will be. I have no doubt but that at the end of a great many of these leases the conditions will be such that there will be no desire to take them over, and that it will be agreeable to everyone to renew the lease to the same lessee, but I believe in some cases it will be desirable to have the Government take the property over, in which cases that action will be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask what the status of the time is? How much time is left on this?

Mr. BAILEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes will be left when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] has finished. Twenty minutes have now been used. The gentleman from Pensylvania is now recognized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak a few words concerning the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

While I am profoundly in sympathy with the broader purposes of this far-reaching measure, it is impossible for me to approve some of its details. In an especial manner I protest against the 50-year term provided for these leases of water power. Fifty years is a long time. It is not so long a time measured in the life of nations, but it is very long measured in economic development. Not a man on this floor to-day can reasonably expect to live to see the expiration of one of these leases if the term provided in this bill shall stand. But I earnestly hope it may not stand. I hope and profoundly urge that it shall be reduced to a much lower limit, to a limit conforming to the better practice of the time in making grants to public-service monopolies. In most cities to-day franchises are limited to 20 or 25 years. Grants for longer terms are the exception rather than the rule.

But there is another phase to this question to which I wish to invite attention. We are proposing here to create a new monopoly force. We are deliberately inviting into the economic arena another and a fresh power against which we are certain later to be found struggling as to-day we are struggling with the power vested in those who control our iron highways, our water supply in cities and towns, our urban and interurban transportation, our telegraph and telephone, our light and heat, and other public utilities. Yes; this new power is to be subject to regulation; it is to be limited in the matter of charges and otherwise. But is this not true also of all the other forces enumerated above? And is not this matter of regulation one of the most serious of all the problems confronting our people to-day? Is it not a growing conviction everywhere that regulation is doomed to ultimate failure, and that it must be supplanted at last by public control and perhaps public operation? To me it seems that what we are really doing with respect to water power is precisely what we have already done, to our shame and our sorrow, with respect to other public utilities.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman make any distinction in this bill between where the Government simply proposes to lease its land for use and the governmental feature of a State in regard to its governmental functions?

Mr. BAILEY. I take it that there is no material difference between this proposed grant and a right of way when it is granted to a railway. The railway company which possesses the shortest and best route between two given points has an advantage which can never be overcome by another power. It therefore possesses a monopoly. There can not be two best water-power supplies for a given locality, and the one that obtains the best will have a monopoly.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield again right there?

Mr. BAILEY. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Evidently the gentleman has not been in the Western States.

Mr. BAILEY. I have been in some of the Western States.

Mr. RAKER. There are many places where there are three or four or five available water powers.

Mr. BAILEY. Then you are more fortunate than most people are. I congratulate the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. The trouble is that one concern tries to control it all.

Mr. BAILEY. That is, by combination. In Chicago I think they have 10 or 12 gas companies; but you have a gas monopoly there just the same, as I remember.

Mr. MANN. We have one gas company.

Mr. BAILEY. You have 1 company controlling 12 or 14.

Mr. MANN. We have at least one.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to yield, but I have only a moment of time.

Mr. GOOD. Just for a question.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

Mr. GOOD. Does not the gentleman know that men like Dr. Bemis, who has, perhaps, made a greater study of this question than any other man in America, say that the only system is the granting of a franchise, a franchise perpetual, or for an indeterminate period? Because where the right to regulate is in a commission or in a State or Government the price must be such, if the franchise is for a limited period, as to give them a fair return on their property and on their investment at the end of the franchise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the debate has quite well disclosed the fact that there is a wide diversity of opinion in the minds of gentlemen here as to what the exact term should be. For instance, we have our good friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who thinks it ought to be in perpetuity, and he quotes what he claims to be the most noted authority on the subject, who says it should be in perpetuity. On the other hand, we have our distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], who says that it should be 25 years. It is easy to differ about what should be the exact term of years and what should be the exact term of the lease.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. What objection is there to that proposition if the Government has the right to purchase under reasonable regulation and has the right to regulate at all times?

Mr. FERRIS. I shall try to reply to the gentleman. The reason, in a word, is that practically all the developed water power now belongs to some 24 power companies, and I shrink from a complete surrender of the rest of it to them. It has gotten into the hands of a little handful of companies, so that now we do not want to give away the rest of it; and the pressing need, in my opinion, for this bill and for legislation is to put in operation more water power, so that there may be some competition preserved between the future water power and the water power that has already crept away from us.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. FERRIS. I regret I can not yield further. I have so little time and I feel we must go on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is not the position of this House practically foreclosed by the action which it took on the Adamson bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I so feel about it.

Mr. MANN. And the two bills ought to conform with each other?

Mr. FERRIS. I think they should; and I thank the gentleman from Illinois for the suggestion.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has well said that this is a case of great interest to the country. The evidence was almost unanimous on the proposition that the terms should be for a maximum of 50 years. Like my colleague on the committee, Mr. THOMSON of Illinois, when we began the consideration of this bill and began the hearings on the subject, embodying pages and pages, I had certain views of my own in regard to the term, and I may say that every man on the committee had in mind a term of years that he thought was a correct one.

But after we had consulted engineers, after we had consulted financiers, after we had consulted what is conceded to be the most eminent authority on water power in the country, it was agreed—and the committee were unanimous, as a result of their investigations—that 50 years should be the term.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield.

Mr. FOWLER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about this question having been discussed. No motion was ever made to change it.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes; there was.

Mr. FOWLER. Only a motion to recommit.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman says there was no vote on that question. There was a motion to recommit.

Mr. FOWLER. It was never discussed, though.

Mr. FERRIS. It was also in the committee. The gentleman has forgotten. I know he does not intend to be mistaken, but nevertheless I feel sure he is.

Mr. FOWLER. That was on a motion to recommit.

Mr. FERRIS. The time or tenure of the lease is pretty well agreed to be 50 years. The enemies of this bill—or rather I will say the opponents of this bill—are insisting that the bill as drawn is not workable. I call to our assistance the friends of conservation, the friends of this bill, the friends of those who want to accomplish something, and ask them to stand by the 50-year term, to the end that they may not pass something that will be inoperative and that will not accomplish anything. The real friends of this bill do not want to make the term 25 years, because if you make the term 25 years you can not get capital to develop these water-power projects. The indictment hurled at the legislation by those opposed to it would then die. Then what will happen? The present entrenched water power of the country will go on without competition, without molestation or regulation, and our Government water power will run idly to the sea.

Mr. Chairman, this precise matter has been given great consideration. The Interior Department thinks 50 years the correct term, and every conceded authority that appeared before us stated that the term should be 50 years. The question is also res judicata in this House. It has been passed on. How can gentlemen justify making the term 50 years on the navigable streams in the East, where population is heavy, where men are rich, and capital more easy of acquirement, and then make the term 25 years out in the West, on the bald prairies, where it is hard to interest capital?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I do not want to be discourteous to my friend, but I am trying to present the views of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have both amendments reported?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, both amendments will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FOWLER:
Page 2, line 2, after the word "than," strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty-five."

Amendment to the amendment, by Mr. MONDELL:
Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "for a period not longer than 50 years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question being taken, Mr. FOWLER demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 35.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in line 2, page 2, I move to strike out the word "fifty," after the word "than," and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "thirty."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have always had the highest respect for the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. He is always interesting, and always sincere. The gentleman undoubtedly has a section of country that he is most industrious for, and I congratulate him for that. There is great hope for the West. It is a hope for me, the same as it is for him. It is a hope for my posterity, the same as it is for his. It is a hope for my country, the same as it is for his. But when the gentleman says there was an amendment offered to the Adamson bill limiting the time to 25 years, and that that amendment was offered by me, and that it was thoroughly discussed on the floor of this House, his memory fails him. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that no amendment was ever offered on the floor of this House to limit the time to 25 years, except an amendment offered to the motion to recommit the bill, and that amendment was offered by myself without debate, the right to debate being cut off by a rule of the House.

Now, it is said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the minds of the Members of this House are concluded upon this proposition. The vote a short time ago revealed that a majority of the minds are concluded in favor of corporations. Now, it may be proper to give this right away in perpetuity, and that is what this bill does——

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOWLER. The Adamson bill gives it away in perpetuity, but I have the utmost confidence in the wisdom of the Senate that it will take care of the rights of the people and come in as the great rescuing power. This bill will grant this right in perpetuity if you make it 50 years. If the question of human slavery had been settled by our forefathers in the beginning of this Government, we would have had no Civil War. Talk about making it perpetual! Talk about taking away from the people a great right like this and giving it to corporations eternally! Do you know that such acts will sow the seeds of dissention within your own borders, which I fear in the future will cause such strife as the sixties hurled upon this Republic. To make it possible for corporations to control this country indefinitely is to sow the seed of bloodshed, and when you say that the Senate will make it perpetual, without limitation, you stand for sowing the seed that will breed dissention and will create more anarchists in America than all the rest of the powers put together. No organization, political or otherwise, will manufacture discord and discontent as fast as a law giving to corporations the control of the business of this country without limitation and without check.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can agree on time. I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this subject in 40 minutes. I wish it could be a much shorter time, because we have debated it so long. I shall want the last 5 minutes myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment close in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, I will vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and I am not afraid that without his amendment the bill would cause socialism to take control of the Government of the United States. I want to say that I believe that before socialism is a controlling factor in the political field in the United States socialism will be neutralized to such an extent that it will probably be on a par, at least, with Democracy or Republicanism or Progressivism, so far as politics are concerned.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FALCONER. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman know that socialism, not political, took charge of the burley tobacco district in Kentucky in order to get relief from the Tobacco Trust?

Mr. FALCONER. Oh, I have heard and read much about the conditions that were supposed to exist that caused that trouble. I have in mind a fine distinction, as I think every Member has, between socialism and anarchy. I am not a Socialist, but I am not afraid of socialism on the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois. I do not believe that 30 years is a sufficient time. I think the bill ought to stand at 50. I think 50 years, however, is the maximum limit, and I would not agree with those who would continue indefinitely the contract with corporations that would develop water power in the United States under a fee simple and permanent title. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a few moments ago made the statement that primarily companies build and construct these water-power plants for the purpose of serving the public.

Mr. Chairman, I believe business men invest their money primarily to make money. I do not believe that we have yet reached that standard of citizenship which is so thoroughly altruistic as to take the position that the business men of this country are going out and putting in their money or selling bonds for the purpose of serving the public. I believe the business man invests his money to make money. I think 50 years is a sufficient time for any company of men to develop a water-power proposition in America. As was stated by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON], we are living in a rapid age, and 50 years is a long time.

I believe that never again should this Government give away water-power sites and forever surrender ownership. This Government should hold title to all water-power sites, and I believe that 50 years is the right period. Twenty-five years is not sufficient time. It would embarrass available capital and result in giving or continuing a monopoly now operating. It has been shown that 27 companies now control the developed water power in the United States. We need more capital to develop more water power. Fifty-year term operation is, in the judgment of men who are interested in conserving the natural resources to the public, the proper time limit.

Mr. Chairman, this Congress has had its time taken by many important measures. A heavy program has been partially worked out. Without question more important legislation has been considered and enacted in this Congress than in any Congress in many years past.

LAND QUESTION.

No question in the legislative program has been more continuously to the front, either directly or incidentally, than the land question, and, Mr. Chairman, no question is more important in its bearing upon the happiness and prosperity of this or any other country than that of land ownership and development.

Besides the several appropriation bills incident to the administration of Government we have given much time to tariff, Alaska Government railroads, currency, trust legislation, immigration, canal tolls, and a thousand and one matters of less importance.

But more important than these, Mr. Chairman, has been the line of legislation having to do with our natural resources.

"Conservation" is a household word in every American home, a subject for debate in every school of economics. Hundreds of bills with their many theories involving land problems have been introduced by Members here.

We have an exhaustive program in land reclamation; we have given much time to and expressed our views on the subject of hydroelectric development; and the conservation bills now before Congress for consideration, detailing proposed lines to be favored, each and all indicate the interest the country is taking in the land question.

During the past 18 months I have had some experience in serving my people in matters that have taken me to the Interior Department, and the experience has been worth while. I am impressed more than ever that the American people are awaking to the necessity for a radical change in land ownership, land development, land taxation, and land as security for low-interest, long-time loans.

There are many men who decry the practice of land monopoly. There are many who condemn land gambling and speculation, and there are many men who take the position that land tenancy under landlordism is a curse to the country fostering the system.

There is a principle as fundamental as life itself, Mr. Chairman, and it is involved in man's right to land possession to an amount sufficient to produce, under his industry, a competency.

The land monopolist does not conduce to general prosperity. The land speculator who boasts of wealth acquired through price manipulation is on a par with a trade-exchange operator. And I will say in passing, Mr. Chairman, that the one factor more than any other that tends to delay low-interest money to the farm borrower is the unstable, unreliable values of land due to the professional land speculator.

I have several times addressed the House on subjects pertaining to farm and land matters, and I have received many communications referring to the subjects discussed. I desire to read into the RECORD a letter I received some days ago from Mr. Theodore Teepe, of Seattle, Wash.

Mr. Teepe's communication leads to the land question. His views are accepted by many people in Washington State. He draws the conclusion that land monopoly, land privilege, and land speculation is a curse to the State.

He further emphasizes the proposition that cooperation conserves energy, and there are many who agree with each of these conclusions.

I insert his communication because I believe he covers important features of the land question:

SEATTLE, July 23, 1914.

Hon. J. A. FALCONER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With the object of directing your attention to certain great questions of human welfare, I am taking the liberty to address you.

One of the big questions of immediate concern is, "What can be done to encourage business?" An analysis of the word "business" almost suggests the answer to the question. Business is nothing but "busy-ness"—that which one is busy about. In that sense all people who do something to make the world richer and better are business people. The term "business" has been associated entirely too much with the idea of exploitation. It is time we were bringing it back to its proper meaning.

If business is nothing but one's busy-ness, it is clear that one must have free play to be busy or active. That suggests just exactly what is the matter with business to-day. Its activities have been restricted to such an extent by the legalized special privileges of the few that business hasn't even room enough to turn around.

The most restrictive of all economic forces is land monopoly. There is not a monopoly of any kind that is not based on land privilege. Neither machinery nor any other commodity contains within it the powers of monopoly. If labor owns only the machinery, the landowners can dictate the terms of employment; but if labor has free access to nature's great storehouse, land, all of the machinery and other commodities in the world now privately owned could be duplicated in three or four years. The existence of the machine is in the mind of him who can construct it.

To open up business opportunity is merely a matter of making labor's access to natural opportunity easier. Holding land out of use is like owning a tollgate. Such tollgates should bear the full burden of our taxes, and such taxes should be increased, little by little, until it would be impossible for anybody to hold a piece of land out of use and profit by it.

LAND SPECULATION AN ECONOMIC CURSE.

Land speculation is probably the greatest of all economic curses. Betting on the rise in value of city lots and farm and timber lands has ruined tens of thousands, and, besides, practically all the stock-market gambling has its foundation on land privilege. The rise in the value of land automatically brings about hard times. When capital can get access to land—which includes timber, water power, minerals, etc.—prosperity abounds, but that very prosperity causes land values to rise until finally capital refuses to pay the high price and the panic is begun.

TAX LAND SPECULATION.

It behooves everybody who lives by the sweat of his brow, whether he be farmer, merchant, or laborer, to start on the steady and persistent policy of taxing all land speculation out of existence. Every penny of increased taxes on the privilege of holding natural opportunity out of use would make the storehouse of nature easier of success and increase the prosperity. If such a policy were started and steadily persisted in, there would never be another period of business inactivity, and when the final goal was reached where all speculative value was taxed out of natural opportunity, the human race would be free from economic oppression.

Think of the wealth producing capacity of such a people! Think of their capacity to enjoy the great and sublime things of life! And yet we, as a society, seem to be afraid to move in the direction of freedom, even though each step would bring greater and greater prosperity.

COOPERATION CONSERVES ENERGY.

Along with opening the storehouse of nature we must learn to save energy by cooperation. Cooperation is the great watchword of the century. Instead of waiting for a paternal Government to do things for us and make life one endless battle with politicians, we should learn to cooperate without the assistance of the State. Cooperative societies based on free access to land, and a money system which can not demand interest except for risk incurred, would make it impossible for the producers to be exploited. Such cooperatives would be run by the workers in, or, in other words, the owners of, that particular cooperative industry. Under a State-owned industry the whole State would be interested in its management through officials appointed or elected for the purpose, and the workers would be enslaved by voters who mean well but who could not be well enough informed to vote intelligently on the intricate questions involved. The small cooperative organizations now in existence are not temporary affairs, to be superseded by State-owned industries, but they are the beginning of the great voluntary organization of society so many dream about.

With this great goal in view, there are many things to do to-day and next day and the next. The Government should do everything in its power to widen the scope and make freer the activities of business. It should organize a nation-wide bureau of information about employment. A department of markets should be organized, with elaborate daily reports of market conditions affecting each locality. Special agents should be sent into every part of the United States to give aid to farmers in particular in organizing cooperative purchasing, selling, and producing societies. A special study of uncertain industries, such as the timber industry, and seasonable industries, such as farming, fishing, etc., should be made. It should be possible to do much to coordinate or dovetail the unsteady or temporary industries so as at least to mitigate their worst features.

When labor in the city and the country begins to cooperate it will demand cheaper money. The money bill recently passed makes plain that sound money should be based on wealth of ready commercial value. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized to issue currency against approved commercial paper, but for each hundred dollars of currency issued there must be deposited as security $100 of approved commercial paper and $40 in gold. It is the gold security that gives Wall Street the money monopoly. It is readily seen that the amount of currency is limited to two and one-half times the available gold, and the power that controls the gold controls the whole money system. Some day our money system will be based strictly on a commodity security and gold will have no advantage over any other commodity. If an individual or an organization has security of proper value, there is no economic reason why they should not be loaned money direct and without interest.

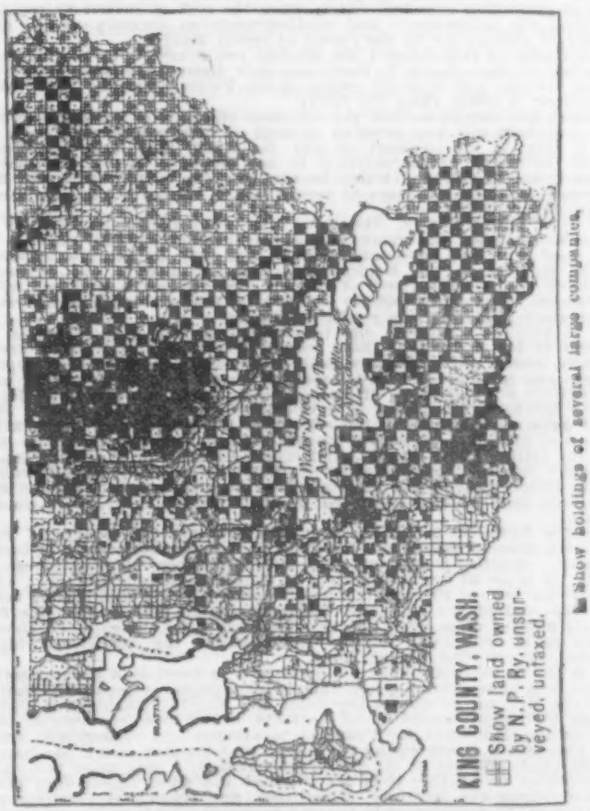
The legislator who can aid labor in realizing that there are ten or a hundred jobs for every laborer if all the restrictions are taken from natural opportunity, and then can aid in clearing away the rubbish so that labor can learn to cooperate, will be of great service to humanity.

With great respect, I am,

Yours, very truly, THEODORE TEEPE.

Mr. Thorwald Siegfried, of Seattle, wrote me some time ago, emphasizing the importance of land distribution to the end that independence and prosperity may come to the community and State.

I desire to read this letter, together with an article of his own writing published some months ago.



The accompanying map shows the large holdings of landowners and, further, the large areas of unsurveyed, untaxed lands in King County.

The area in black is largely timberlands and will not be available for agricultural purposes until the timber has been removed.

It is all interesting, and I insert this article and letter for the purpose of giving to the public the viewpoint of one who has made a study of the land problem and who has reached the conclusion that the land belongs to the people for their legitimate use and of right should not be held as the wares of exchange for the land speculator.

FUNDAMENTAL REFORM LEAGUE ISSUES MAP INTENDED TO SHOW SIX MEN HOLD MOST OF PROPERTY.

(By Thorwald Siegfried.)

The first day the Seattle Sun appeared its first editorial spoke for the future greatness of Seattle and pictured a metropolis without slums.

Next year immigrants out of whom slums usually grow, will begin arriving by hundreds and thousands.

The question is, Shall the immigrants form slums in the city or create wealth, commerce, and prosperity by working land?

What can the immigrant do with the land shown in the map in black—owned by six corporations?

Some of it is for sale, some can not be bought at any price. For instance, try to buy a lot or an acre in the big tract of timberland below West Seattle, inside the city limits. It is simply not for sale. In New York City the Astors put big signs on their property, "Astor estate: Not for sale." It is the same in King County but without the board signs. If it were for sale the price would still stand in the immigrant's way and would be a demand on him that he pay money and labor for something that is the Creator's gift to the race. Trying to determine what is a "fair" price for natural resources is like trying to find a "fair" price for permission to put a tollgate across Second Avenue; there isn't any fairness about it, looking at it from the immigrant's point of view.

Besides the land shown in black, much of the white land is also held idle for speculation, and it is not to be wondered at that the immigrant stops in the cities, where he can "flop" from night to night at 10 or 15 cents per, instead of going on to land for which tens, hundreds, and thousands of dollars are demanded before he can perform the labor for which we really want him to come here.

The real crux of the situation has been revealed in the dealings between the city of Seattle and the Northern Pacific in the watershed area. The condemnation jury ascertained, and the city will pay, the present value, in money, of the land and timber taken from various owners.

Rather than sell its land and timber at their present value, the Northern Pacific gave the city its land, free of cost, providing it could keep the timber and could remove it sometime within 30 years.

The value that is expected to accrue in the future is the lure that makes men hold land which they will never use themselves.

King County would take the greatest forward step in its history if it could, lawfully, and would pay the owners of all its lands what they are worth to-day and then throw them open to those who would actually use them productively, either without cost or at a cost never to exceed their present value.

Immigrants will test the soundness of our institutions. The fact that they give us concern in so new a country is proof that things are not altogether right. Oregon and Washington, if they had the whole population of the United States within their borders, would have a population less dense than that of England.

Seattle already has a small slum condition, revealed by the activities of Building Inspector Josenhans; the growth or extinction of slums depends in a large measure on what we do with the land.

The sections of land marked with double crosses on the map and similar lands in other counties are the lands affected by Congressman FALCONER'S proposal to have unsurveyed timberlands listed for taxation. At present they are untaxed, and the Government in protecting its timber from fire protects these untaxed lands also.

Hon. J. A. FALCONER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The foundations of our civil liberties were laid in the Magna Charta of 1215, of our religious liberty in the foundation of the American Colonies, and you, as a Member of Congress, can take part in grounding economic liberty upon the rock of justice by making practical the adjustments and readjustments so urgently needed and so clearly pointed out by the events of recent months.

As a part of this letter I am sending you a review of the Mexican situation by Hon. Louis F. Post, Assistant United States Secretary of Labor, founder and formerly editor of the Public, Chicago, from which the review is taken (May 29, 1914).

Mexico has taught us that the existence of a law or custom whereby men may hold idle any quantity of land or may permit other men to use it only on the payment of rent, for which they make no return except the giving of the privilege to use the land—a privilege which is not theirs to give and which inheres in every man by virtue of his existence—that the existence of such a law or custom breeds revolution of the unquenchable sort.

* * * Governments, like men, reap what they sow. You as a Congressman have the great privilege of helping our Government to sow good will and peace and wisdom not only in the international affairs incident to the Mexican situation but also in our domestic problems which, like those of Mexico, are too much polluted with selfishness, fear, and violence to endure the successive cataclysms which their malformations render inevitable.

It is needless for me to cite to you figures or specific instances in support of the claim that those economic relationships which express tyranny, greed, and constant violence have so far extended their depredations and have become so detested in the public conscience that our alternatives are only those of intelligent, conscientious effort at reform on the one hand as opposed to a violent overthrow on the other. For one I have faith enough in the efficacy of the former and in the willingness of men such as you to cooperate to that end, so that I do not fear the latter; yet I do not blind myself to the fact that our people are more irascible, less phlegmatic, than the siesta-loving Mexicans, and to tempt them to use in retaliation the violence with which they have been deceived and oppressed would be as foolhardy as it would be fatal.

Already 5,000,000 people in New York City are the tenants of but 125,000 landlords, and census returns show a constant increase in farm tenantry. Seattle, a city of over 300,000 people, is situated in a county as large as Delaware, rich in minerals, timber, and soil; yet over 40 per cent of the county's area is owned by six interlocking corporations, and of the remainder much more than half is held idle by a small number of persons. Mexico has taught us not so much about Mexico as it has taught us the significance of the conditions which we meet in everyday life at home.

Is it too much to ask that Congress take in hand as a Federal matter the task of ascertaining how far we tolerate institutions which have made the Mexican revolution inevitable and inextinguishable? If there is need for enlightenment as to the facts, is the task too large or too vital or too dangerous for Congress to attempt? I respectfully urge upon you that it is not asking too much; that the task is not too large, not too vital, and not at all dangerous. Indeed, I urge upon you consideration as to whether it is not the first and most urgent duty now devolving upon the Members, committees, and Houses of Congress to ascertain whether monopoly in natural resources—land, water, minerals, and sites—is not wholly deleterious to our welfare as a Nation and as individuals

I do respectfully recommend that a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress be authorized to make investigations, collect data, and take testimony, and to publish the results thereof, with respect to the causes and incidents of the Mexican revolution and their relationship to the internal problems of the United States.

Respectfully, THORWALD SIEGFRIED.

Mr. Chairman, I am inserting herewith extracts from the article of Mr. Louis F. Post referred to in Mr. Siegfried's letter. It is evident that Mr. Post attributes the persistent discord and ever-menacing turmoil which has characterized Mexico for a century to a land-spoliation system. Treating this subject, he says:

Beginning with the revolution of 1810, under the patriotic priest, Hidalgo, and closing with the military progress of the Constitutionalists in 1913, this history lays bare the terrible experiences of the Mexican masses in their patient efforts to recover land and liberty under law—under better laws in many ways than we boastful "Saxons" can truly claim our own to be.

Their struggle of a century has been animated by the longing of Mexican peasants to democratize Mexican land. Hidalgo led the first revolt. The land was in process of restoration to the people for tillage when he, betrayed to the aristocracy by one of his own officers, was condemned and shot for "treason." But the hundred years' war had only begun. Under the leadership of Morellos, the first constitution was adopted in 1813. It recognized equality of citizenship and established liberty of the press, a free ballot, abolition of personal taxation, partial abolition of land monopoly, and the popular initiation of laws. In 1815 the pendulum swung backward again. Morellos also was executed. Still the war went on, and the pendulum once more swung forward. A new constitution was adopted in 1824—though for national independence rather than popular freedom—and Guerrero, the great Mexican "Commoner" became President. Guerrero abolished the last vestige of chattel slavery, and loosened the bonds of peon servitude. His successor, however, was treacherous to the people, and there was despotic reaction again. But again not for long. The democratic spirit came uppermost in 1833, when for a little while popular government resumed its sway, but only to be thwarted by revivals of the old aristocratic, ecclesiastical, and military conspiracies. Through these, Santa Ana vaulted into the dictatorial saddle.

At this time Mexico offered temptations to the American slave-ocracy similar to those which have more recently made American plutocracy keen for war, and our war of conquest began. Its passions have lingered in Mexico all these years. The Mexican people have distrusted us ever since. Nor without reason. Our object in making war upon Mexico remembered, and the efforts of American investors in Mexican concessions to precipitate another war of conquest considered, why should they not be distrustful?

On both sides that war of Santa Ana's day was "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight," as most wars are. It served to solidify the Mexican classes while it lasted, but when it was over the long-drawn-out Mexican civil war of 1810 revived. The revolutionists under Alvarez were triumphant at first in this democratic revival, but his successor, Comonfort, was soon afterwards displaced by upper-class conspiracies. Conciliatory to those propertied interests of his country, which never in any country conciliate except to gain leverage for a vicious spring. Comonfort ended his life in exile.

Meantime, however, the constitution of 1857—perhaps the most advanced democratic constitution in history—was adopted. It declared that the right to landed property depends upon occupation, and that this requisite can not exist "unless the land be worked and made productive." Described by the authors of this history as "the exact expression of the Mexican people, as distinguished from the church, army, and aristocracy," the democratic constitution of 1857 had been 47 years in the making. For 57 years following the Mexican peasantry had fought for it against treachery within and speculation from without. They are fighting for it yet.

Not only did the Mexican constitution of 1857 demand the land of Mexico for the industrious people of Mexico; it expressly recognized that "the rights of man are the foundation and the purpose of social institutions"; that "everyone is born free"; that education must be free; that "every man is free to adopt the profession, trade, or work that suits him—it being useful and honest—and to enjoy the product thereof"; that "no man shall be compelled to work without his plain consent and without just compensation"; that "the liberty of writing and publishing writings upon any matter is inviolable"; that religious institutions shall not own real estate, except buildings used immediately and directly for their own services; and that there shall be no law establishing or forbidding any religion.

The ecclesiastical attempts to overthrow this constitution, aided by foreign influences, were unsuccessful, thanks to the patriotic leadership of Juarez, until France established an imperial throne in Mexico with Maximilian upon it. When Maximilian's throne toppled, Juarez came again into high service and for nine years made that splendid constitution of 1857 a living thing. He remained the people's President from 1867 until his death, being again and again elected by free popular vote. During this golden reconstruction period Mexican peasants peacefully tilled the little farms that had been carved for them out of great estates, under their constitution of 1857.

But when Juarez had passed away, Diaz came into power. This was in 1876. The civilizing work done by Juarez has, by iteration and reiteration, been falsely attributed to Diaz. His own work consisted not in building up the Mexican democracy, but in turning democratic Mexico into despotic and barbarous Mexico.

It was under Diaz that the constitutional land reforms of Juarez were swept away by stupendous frauds, made effective by unbridled power. The details are shocking. Industrious peasants were evicted summarily from their little holdings, lawlessly and without even an investigation of their rights. The Diaz policy was the immediate cause of a renewal of this hundred years' war, the modern echoes of which we have been recently hearing from Torreon, Tampico, Saltillo, San Luis Potosi, and even from the City of Mexico.

* * * * * *

The land question is the core of this struggle by Mexican peasants for equal rights and by their adversaries for monopoly privileges. Until the land question in Mexico is settled, and settled right or in the right direction, the hundred years' war in Mexico, now well into its two hundredth year, will not end. There can be no permanent peace there until the land of Mexico has been democratized.

LOUIS F. POST.

Mr. Chairman, there are many students of land economics who advocate the reestablishment of the country-life commission. President Roosevelt by an Executive order established such a commission. His successor discontinued the services of the commission.

President Wilson, through the Agricultural Department, is giving some attention to rural organization. Dr. Carver, the expert of this branch of the work, is a firm believer in the necessity for a thorough investigation of all conditions pertaining to farm-land location and improvement.

He believes in getting at the conditions of land sales, land taxation, and the cooperative possibilities tending to mutual benefits, for all these details have to do with a farm credits system, which is now being considered by the department.

In consideration of this question with leading men in Congress it has generally been expressed that it was high time for the Government to investigate the methods employed by land speculators.

The rural-organization experts complain that land values, especially undeveloped land values, upon which to establish a farm-loan basis is made difficult by reason of the operations of the speculator and monopolist.

I believe the proper way and the most feasible is to extend the operations of the rural-organization branch of the department to do the work suggested in Mr. Siegfried's communication above quoted.

His position that reckless speculation in "mother earth" should be brought to an end is timely. The Government should act.

Mr. Chairman, I shall emphasize the necessity for an appropriation sufficient in amount to cover special work by the rural-organization branch in the next Agricultural appropriation bill, with a further provision that the department be instructed to procure all information regarding methods employed to inflate the selling prices of undeveloped lands.

A sufficient appropriation should be made by Congress to do this work. Inflated land prices drive men to the cities. "Idle land makes idle men."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment presents a very interesting question. I am not in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], because I believe that franchises of this kind should be perpetual in so far as the period of time is concerned. The rule of law is not different in respect to a water-power project from what it is in respect to gas companies and water companies or electric companies that occupy the streets of our cities. The Supreme Court of the United States has frequently held that when a franchise is given to a company to occupy the streets of a city for the purpose of laying gas pipes, water mains, or erecting electric-light poles to furnish a public utility the company so engaged in that enterprise is entitled to a rate that will not only pay a fair return upon the capital invested, make the repairs, and provide for the depreciation, but that will be sufficient at the end of the period for which the franchise has been given to turn back to the company its capital unimpaired.

What is the question here? The gentleman's amendment, if it means anything, would give to those men that will put their money in water-power propositions their money back at the end of 30 years, in addition to the annual interest thereon. The investment ought to be one that will continue for a great many years. The plant should be operated under regulations and rules, in this case, that will permit the Secretary of the Interior or a public-utilities commission of a State to regulate the price to be charged for power. I do not care what company or what individual may be granted the privilege and you do not care what company or what individual may own the water power any more than you care what company owns the gas pipes or the electric lines in your city. What you are interested in and what the people are interested in is a low rate, and in order to get a low rate for the commodity furnished you must give a long period of time, with proper regulations and with a right in the Government to purchase in the meantime.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not, then, make it indefinite?

Mr. GOOD. That is what I am arguing for, with the right to regulate the price, because I am not in favor of paying the man who puts his money into the plant a fair return upon his property and then every 30 years pay him back what his investment amounted to, and that is what the gentleman's amendment means.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman will deprive the people of the right of recovery entirely?

Mr. GOOD. Not at all. I would give the people a greater protection than the gentleman's amendment gives them. I would give them a lower rate, with the right of the Government to buy the property on reasonable terms and conditions.

Mr. FOWLER. When?

Mr. GOOD. At any time.

Mr. FOWLER. That is all right if it is provided that it may be done at any time.

Mr. GOOD. But the gentleman's proposition fixes a time when a person must have his investment back, and in order that he may get his investment back at frequent intervals the patrons must pay an increased rate. If the gentleman will look at the decisions, he will find that every decision of the Supreme Court has been to the point that the rate must be high enough to yield enough money so that at the end of the franchise the company shall not only have paid a return upon the investment, but shall have enough money out of the rate so fixed to return the original investment in cash.

Mr. FOWLER. Then why does not the gentleman offer an amendment to that effect? The bill does not provide for reclaiming the property at any time.

Mr. GOOD. This is not my bill, and I am amazed at the chairman of the committee, who says that the House is foreclosed from ever taking such action. Think of his claim that this great House of Representatives, claiming to be progressive, can not take an action that is right because it has already taken an action that is wrong. This, too, in connection with a bill that everybody knows will never become a law. I believe that if some one had offered a motion to strike out all after the enacting clause in the Adamson bill at the proper time the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, would not have resisted it.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, the gentleman is speaking facetiously, and surely does not mean anything he says.

Mr. GOOD. I mean that it is a very peculiar argument when the gentleman says that the House is foreclosed against ever taking action in respect to a perpetual franchise in matters of this kind simply because in the Adamson bill it fixed the franchise period at 50 years. That is not only laughable, but it is ridiculous. That is standpatism run mad.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, some years ago—February 15, 1901—the House passed an act which gave the department the right to grant rights of way for pipe lines, telephones, electrical purposes, reservoirs, etc. Now, at that time the House thought it was extending conditions a long way, and it gave in that bill the same power as in this, so far as handling the public domain is concerned, and the question of tenure was fixed at the will and pleasure of the Secretary of the Interior. After men had gone out and expended their money, had expended hundreds of thousands of dollars, and even running into the millions, when they were then in a position to do a legitimate business, their revocable permit was ended, their right was determined, and they could proceed no further; and, practically speaking, the development of water power in the Western States has been at a standstill for the last six or seven years. There has been a clamor in this country for development. The people had the money and the people wanted to develop it. They recognized and realized that a few had obtained the right by purchase of private lands and water rights and ditches, some from the public domain, and had obtained an absolute monopoly upon the power situation; and my distinguished friend from Illinois, who talks about monopoly, evidently has not seen the condition of the West. Evidently he does not know the situation in the West. For the last eight years we have been doing but little development. We have been in the grasp and the control of a few interests, and the act of 1901 continued to give them that grasp; and this bill is for the purpose of relieving the situation so that the people may have a chance to develop this great industry—have a chance to develop that great country—and that the money not only of this country but of the world may go to the western country, where they can develop and receive a fair rate of interest and obtain a safe investment.

I know my friend from Illinois, judging what is in his mind from what he speaks, is not in favor of continuing this undevelopment. The very purpose of giving this time of 50 years is so that these men can expend their money to the end that they may charge a reasonable amount for the power that they furnish. We place restrictions on them. If we add to their rates and charge them large sums for it, then the consumer will have to pay for it in the end. This is not what we want. The consumer that my friend spoke about is always the man to go down in his pocket and pay it. Notwithstanding all the talk you may make, every engineer, every man who understood this subject who appeared before the committee, stated that in the long run the consumer will be compelled to pay, and therefore this bill ought to be made 50 years at least, so that this property may be properly developed, so that the consumer will not be absolutely robbed in the meantime, because he wants a little power. We have absolute control. This Congress can control these grants and make regulations when you make a grant like a private individual can. In addition to that, in addition to the rules and regulations specified by Congress under the provisions of the grant, the public-service corporations of each State can control them and make them sell their property, not only sell to all who may ask but make them sell at a reasonable and fair value to the consumer at all times; provided they get a fair rate of interest upon the money invested. What more do you want? The history of this country has been against leasing, has been against entailing, has been in favor of title in fee simple from the Government. If these leases were indeterminate, if this property were sold outright and fee given, they have full control in regard to its service, in regard to all supplies, and what has made this country one of the greatest under the sun is to give each man, each institution, a fee simple title, in what he deals with, but at the same time keeping the control over the charges that he may make when he furnishes it to the public and when it is a public service——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois and further to crave the indulgence of the committee for just a moment to call attention to the fact that this is a great and glorious day in our history as a people. This day, if all has gone well, down yonder on the Isthmus the good ship Ancon, newly painted, flag bedecked, with a delegation of representatives of the Republic of Panama and of the courageous men who have planned and completed the canal for us, is steaming from the waters of the Atlantic through the giant locks of Gatun out onto the great inland lake, over it and through the great cut of Culebra, through the locks of Pedro Miguel, and down to the Miraflores Lake, and just about this good hour [applause], just about now, it ought to be locking through the Miraflores Lock down the watery stairs to the calm waters of the Pacific. [Applause.] It is the modest but impressive unofficial opening to commerce of the greatest engineering work of all times. Thank God, it was undertaken by our people, carried through in less time than anticipated, more cheaply than we could have reasonably expected, without unnecessary loss of life, without a breath of scandal, it stands a monument of all the ages to the ability, the courage, the honesty, and the endurance of a great people and their honored representatives who have performed this great work. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would certainly vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, because I believe that a 50-year franchise in all works to be constructed under this bill would be too long, and I would vote to support his amendment if it were not for the language in the bill which provides for a period not longer than 50 years. Now, the gentlemen who are advocating the shorter period are contending that the grant, as I construe their arguments, must be for a period of 50 years. In this position they are mistaken, because he can make the grant for any period not to exceed 50 years. This meets their objection in this matter. The administration of this measure is lodged in the Secretary of the Interior, and the whole of it is dependent upon his good judgment. There are many of these plants that will entail a vast amount of expenditure for which the 50-year franchise would not be too long. There are many others for which I think 25 years or even 20 years would be amply long. But if the Secretary of the Interior is constructed upon the right plan and wants to protect the people of the country against the invasion of water-power monopolies, that power is lodged in him in the language of this bill.

And the administration of this law, whether it be good or bad, necessarily because of the law itself, depends upon the conduct and the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior. If he is constructed right and wants to do the right thing by the American people, by this great Government, he can make this an instrument of wonderful power and of wonderful benefit to the American people; but if he is inclined to favor monopoly, combines, and trusts, he can work a wonderful injury to the American people.

Now, I do not agree with these gentleman who say you must give a 50-year franchise in order to get capital. I know men interested in water power are making such assertions as that here. But gentlemen must not forget that they are not talking for the interests of this country, but are talking for their own interest and their own profit. It is a notorious fact that the franchises under the statutes of many States for cities, granting franchises for waterworks, for gas mains, for electric lights, and for all public utilities, can not be granted for a longer period than 20 years, notably, in Indiana, and perhaps a number of other States; and there is not a city in that State, or any other State having such a law, that has ever had to put an advertisement in any newspaper in this country to get capital to come to construct an electric light, waterworks, or any other public utility. They will invest their money in a city franchise involving in many instances quite as large an expenditure as is required to construct a water power or develop the properties. There will be no trouble to get capital, I assert, to make investments in these water powers, which will be vastly more profitable than public utilities in the cities. So the talk that capital will not invest in these properties amounts to nothing when you sift it out on this proposition. There will be no trouble, I predict, in that respect. And the men who have been making that argument around the committees and around the corridors of this House are not talking for the interests of the American people or the Government of the United States, but they are talking for their individual interests, to enhance their private investments or investments they propose to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. I am not intimidated, Mr. Chairman, into voting for it because of the statement that we are liable to be involved in socialism if I do not. I believe that the democracy of this Republic after a hundred years of experience, after it has found that the liberties of the people are preserved by an obedience to law, will not turn away after that experience to the vagaries and theories advanced by Socialists. I am as much opposed to socialism as I am to communism, to nihilism, or to anarchy. They are children all born of the same mother, and all related except in a little different degree.

I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, to hear the chairman of this committee assert that the water-power monopolies are to be controlled by giving a 50-year franchise. That is not the remedy. You can not take the power to control water franchises away from these water-power companies by limiting the franchise. The only method to control water-power companies is to control them by limitations written in this bill and statutes to be enforced as to their power to inflict injuries upon the people. What is the difference between 25 years and 50 years? No man who has advocated 25, or 30, or 50 years, as a remedy for monopolistic oppression has pointed out how that number of years is going to effect the purpose.

If this Congress is wise it will write into the statute such limitations and put the execution of the statute into such hands as will absolutely control the operation of the parties having the right to develop hydroelectricity, and that is the only method by which and through which it can be done.

Gentlemen talk about preserving the rights of the people. The rights of the people will be preserved when we limit the operation of these companies through the statutes that we write, and in no other way. I am for this bill, Mr. Chairman, because I believe this settles one question—a question of control, and puts that control in the Federal Government—although I believe this bill has more holes in it than there are in a skimmer when it comes to its practical application, because there is no express and definite limitation written in the text. Yet I believe it to be in the interest of the people, because it initiates a beginning of development that future legislation may safeguard. In my opinion, there has not been a bill introduced in this House in the five years I have been here that so opens the door to monopolistic control as this bill does, and does it in favor of the water powers. Why? Because those restrictions that ought to be put in this bill in order to protect the people are absent. That is the reason. And gentlemen say we will preserve the rights of the States. Why, my friend, it is as natural to tend toward centralization as it is for democracy to exist, and we shall continue to do that in this empire of republics as long as the Republic shall stand. When great interstate problems arise in our rapid economic development that involve people beyond the confines of a State, then the Federal Government must be supreme. And the only recourse we have is to hedge about our legislation with such power of limitation as shall protect the interests of the people.

No man has pointed out here why a limitation should be written in this bill, and yet I understand why a limitation is put in. There is a fever of excitement in this country against indeterminate franchises. There is a bill here for the diversion of the waters of Niagara River, and we put a determinate franchise in it not for any well-founded reason, but to meet the spirit of the times on the subject. Every time you limit the operation of a franchise you at the same time load upon the consumer a price for the product that he must pay. That is the truth about the matter. Let us take an illustration from the Niagara Falls proposition, the greatest development of water power probably there is in the United States to-day. Two companies, operating on this side of the Niagara River, have an investment of over $40,000,000 in those two plants alone. Is it to be supposed by men of sound judgment that if those companies were limited to 30 years that you could go into the market and get $30,000,000 to invest in a plant of that character? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on principle I have always been in favor of the indeterminate franchise, properly guarded, as a regulation. However, I have observed that as a rule in the cities where the franchise for street car lines is limited to 20 years, as is the case in many cities, they work it out very well and do not attempt to collect during the period of the franchise a profit to remunerate themselves entirely for the principal, nor do I think that would be the case here. But the House the other day, when the Adamson dam bill was up, gave more consideration to the question of the length of the franchise than it did to any other proposition that was before the committee. The Adamson dam bill provided in section 9 for a 50-year franchise which should continue until compensation had been made to the grantee for the fair value of its property as provided in the bill, so that it made it a 50-year franchise, and at the end of that time an indeterminate franchise.

An amendment was offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] to strike that section out of the bill and to insert a section which made a clear 50-year franchise. That was discussed at length. A vote was had on it in the House late in the afternoon. A point of no quorum was made, and when the House went into committee again I made a point of no quorum, so that the House would be fairly well filled in the committee, and a vote was had upon it by tellers. The amendment, making it a straight 50-year franchise, prevailed. I did not vote for the amendment. I voted against it. I thought it was worse than the provision in the bill. But the House having taken its position on this question in the Adamson bill, regulating the construction of dams over navigable waters, it would be made to look very silly if to-day, on another bill regulating dams over other waters, it should reverse its position and take any other position on a matter of that sort. Hence I am in favor of the provision in the bill for a 50-year franchise, recognizing, as I do, that in any event, whatever the length of the franchise is, the right of regulation during the period is preserved, and the value of the property at the end of the period is preserved to the owners of the property.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to consume only a moment, and then I shall ask for a vote.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] was of the opinion that this bill had no features of regulation in it. I want to call his attention to the fact that we are considering only the first section of the bill at the present moment, and that all through the bill, first and last, and almost in every section, there is an absolute power of regulation. In other words, the Secretary of the Interior has the right to incorporate in the lease or in the contract, which is the very vital part of this whole transaction, such conditions, such safeguards, such provisions as will protect the public interest, so that the gentleman treats the committee without fairness when he says the bill is totally without regulation. Again——

Mr. CLINE. I did not want to cast any reflection on the committee, and did not do so. I did not say that. I said the bill did not have such regulations as I thought ought to be in the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. I gladly stand corrected.

Other gentlemen have made statements to the effect that the bill could be driven through with a team and six, and so forth. I shall not take any offense at that; I feel sure such statements can not be borne out. In any event the bill is open for amendments and any oversight of the committee will be corrected by the House. I do not want the House even momentarily to think that this bill is the product of my own handiwork. I hope no one has at any time been misled about that. This bill was framed after an extended conference with engineers from over the United States, after conferences with leading Senators, after conferences with Members of the House, and later after conferences with officials of the Geological Survey, the Interior Department, the Agriculture Department, and so forth; so that it is not a jumped-up affair, it is not a bill that has been without careful consideration. It is, on the contrary, a bill which has been very carefully prepared, however much it may be slandered on the floor of this House. It is easy for men who have given no consideration whatever to water-power legislation to jump up here and say, "This is merely waste paper." But a close analysis of the bill, a close analysis of its effect, and an analysis of the consideration which it has had will not bear up any such assault as that. On the contrary, this bill is open to such amendments as the committee desires to offer. It is subject, of course, to amendments from the Republican Party and from the Progressive Party and from the Democratic Party that will help the bill.

I call attention to the fact that the Republican Party and the Progressive and the Democratic Parties all helped to make this bill. The conferences that brought it into existence were all nonpartisan. The members of the committee acted in unison and accord. All the great political parties are pledged in their platforms to something along this line, and this House ought to do something. I am glad to see some of the Republican Members helping; I am glad to see the Democratic Members helping; and I am glad to see the Progressive Members helping. And I am proud of the present Secretary of the Interior for his attitude on this subject, because he took the lead in this matter and has blazed the way; and I am glad to see him taking hold of the plow where ex-Secretary Fisher left it, and doing work in keeping with the work of the preceding Secretary and in keeping with those people in this country who have given most thought to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a rereading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "Interior," strike out the words "may, in his discretion."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CURRY. The word "shall" should be inserted.

The Clerk read as follows:

And insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment at the end of five minutes. We debated this matter thoroughly on the first day on the question of making it mandatory.

Mr. CURRY. I had another amendment there that I wanted to offer.

Mr. FERRIS. This does not preclude the offering of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I do not want to take time; but I did not offer any amendment on this. This is a different proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman offered it on the first day, to make it mandatory.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Secretary of the Interior should be required to give preference to the application of a sovereign State or any of its political subdivisions for the lease of a national resource within the boundaries of the State. This amendment makes it mandatory that the Secretary of the Interior shall give the preference to the filings and applications of States, counties, and municipalities. Under the bill as it now reads it is within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. It seems to me that that discretion ought not to be vested in the Secretary of the Interior, but that the provision should be mandatory that he should be required to give preference to the applications of States, counties, and municipalities. I do not care to take up the time of the committee; but I will state that a number of years ago the city of San Francisco made up its mind that it wanted to get the water and power from the Hetch Hetchy Valley. It took years to get the bill through this House. The city of San Francisco had one or two permits from the Secretary of the Interior. In the meantime some people in California, recognizing the fact that in time San Francisco would require and acquire the power and the water from the Hetch Hetchy Valley, filed on water and power sites necessary to the project, simply to stand up the city of San Francisco; and they did stand up the city of San Francisco, which had to pay those speculators $1,000,000 for their equity before it could use the water and power sites, the right of way to which was given to them by the Congress of the United States. This amendment of mine rectifies and makes impossible such a condition of affairs as that occurring in the future, and I think it ought to be adopted. And then, again, the filing of the people on a site for public use ought to be given preference over the filing of an individual or a private corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The question being taken, Mr. CURRY demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "required," on page 2, line 22, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "desired."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 22, strike out the word "required" and insert the word "desired."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this is in that part of the paragraph which provides that a prospective lessee may enter upon the public lands for the purpose of making suitable investigations. Now, the language of the bill is—

For the purpose of enabling an applicant for a lease to secure the data required in connection therewith.

I should like to ask some member of the committee just what is meant by the word "required"? Is it to ascertain some things required by this bill, or is it to ascertain some facts that may be valuable to the man or corporation upon which to determine the feasibility of the project?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS] is out of the Hall temporarily. My recollection of the hearings and the investigation is that before the Secretary will give these permits he will require considerable data; he will want to know all the facts about the project; and we decided that the word "required" was more apt and appropriate under the circumstances than the word "desired" would be.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think the word "desired" would be more suitable than the word "required," if it is the object to give to the lessee or the licensee the opportunity to acquire the information he wants?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think it is of very great importance which word we use; but we thought "required" was nearer the intent. The meaning of the word "desired" might depend on who desired it.

Mr. MILLER. It makes this difference: The rights of the man or the corporation are to be determined by the law. If the law says he can go upon the land for one purpose, he surely can not go upon the land for another purpose.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is a little more than the law here. The Secretary of the Interior has a right to and will adopt regulations which people will have to comply with, and his regulations will call for certain data that will be required by him, as well as by the law, and we thought that was the proper and appropriate expression. I see no reason to change that word.

Mr. MILLER. Now the gentleman has given me some information that I wanted at the outset. Is it the idea of the committee that the man or corporation, the licensee, can go upon the public lands to secure information that will enable him to answer certain things required by law, by the Government, or to enable him to get information that will be desirable on his part to determine whether or not he wants to take out the license or the lease?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He has got to obtain certain facts and data to show whether or not it is a feasible proposition, whether or not it is proper for the Government to grant and permit and tie up the site for a year pending somebody's application; and it would seem as though the Government, in order to prevent speculation and possible monopoly and bad faith, in order to prevent wildcatting and uselessly tying up of sites for a year, or probably a number of years in succession, must necessarily, in order to enable the Secretary to carry out the law in good faith, require certain definite investigation, probably rating and measurement of streams, topographical and other surveys, and maps and other things; in other words, to show the man's good faith, and that it is a feasible and practicable proposition, and that the applicant has or can acquire sufficient rights and suitable property to warrant the undertaking.

Mr. MILLER. In the balance of my time I thank the gentleman for his very courteous reply.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to suggest that what is desired, as I understand it, is to give an applicant the opportunity to secure the information that it is necessary for him to have. Would it not be better to amend the provision so that it would read:

For the purpose of enabling the applicant for a lease to secure data in connection therewith.

Mr. MILLER. I think that would be the exact meaning or practically the exact meaning of the language, if it was amended as I suggested. One or the other ought to be adopted, and if the motion I make to strike out and insert is voted down, the suggestion of the gentleman ought to be adopted.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. RAKER. The very purpose of the bill would be defeated if the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] were adopted, and that of the gentleman from Minnesota, as well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to close debate in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to go to the gentleman from Minnesota and 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to close debate in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me modify that request and make it close debate on this amendment and all amendments to the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I would object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The request has been put and granted. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of some member of the committee. As I understand, the opening part of this paragraph, wherein the language gives to the Secretary authority, was debated at length. That is, it was contended by the committee that the language here employed gives to the Secretary discretionary power, and, as I understood the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, he said that in his opinion it was wise that the Secretary should be in a position, if there were two applicants, John and Pete, and he thought Pete was better than John to deny John's application and to accept Pete's. If that is true, in what respect is his power enlarged or changed by the proviso, the language contained in lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and the first half of line 20? If he can give preference in his discretion to one corporation over another corporation, to one individual over another individual, why has he not, then, full power to give preference to a municipality as against a private corporation or as against a private individual? Is there any enlargement of his authority contained in there that is not apparent from reading the paragraph?

Mr. FERRIS. I understand the gentleman's amendment is to strike out the word "required" and insert the word "desired."

Mr. MILLER. I had departed from discussing that amendment and was making another inquiry.

Mr. FERRIS. Is the gentleman objecting to the granting of the discretion to the Secretary?

Mr. MILLER. I am not objecting to anything. I am an humble applicant for information.

Mr. FERRIS. Just what is it the gentleman desires to know?

Mr. MILLER. I was inquiring in what respect the authority or discretion of the Secretary of the Interior is enlarged by lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20—if under the language of the earlier part of the paragraph he can select one from two or more applicants and give him preference?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the proviso deals with another matter, if the gentleman will read it.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, I have read it twenty times.

Mr. FERRIS. The original paragraph deals with leasing of the property, and the proviso that the gentleman is now speaking to deals with the issuance of the permit. It was our thought that he ought to have discretion.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but my interrogation is in reference to the language preceding the permit portion of the paragraph.

Mr. FERRIS. I was replying to that as well. It was our thought that he should have discretion both as to the granting of the lease and the granting of the permit.

Mr. MILLER. So that, as a matter of fact, it is redundant.

Mr. FERRIS. We wanted to make it plain; I do not think it is repetition.

Mr. MILLER. I would like now to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], if I have any time left, to repeat the query that he made when my time previously expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in the provision that the gentleman moved to strike out, referring to the word "required," that is a Government function—that the Government requires of the applicant—and the gentleman's amendment would simply permit the man to furnish such data on the ground that he might desire for his own use and not for the Government's use; and if the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming were adopted, to secure such data, that might not give the department any information. He might secure certain data and then say, "That is all I want."

Mr. MILLER. What information does the department require of a prospective lessee?

Mr. RAKER. The department wants all of the information that it is possible to get.

Mr. MILLER. I thought that it possessed all possible information.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; they are not all wise. They need a good deal of information.

Mr. MILLER. Do I understand that the department does not intend to act upon the information that it secures through its agents, but upon the information secured by the prospective lessee?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, more to answer the gentleman's inquiry than to make any statement, I want to say that the word "desired" obviously is used from the standpoint of the applicant alone—what he desires to get from the Secretary. The word "required" refers to the Secretary's position. A man makes an application—"I desire this." "Well," the Secretary may say, "that is more than is 'required' for your purpose, fairly." Therefore, the word "required" is better, because it is a matter that both must agree upon, and it enables the Secretary to say, "You desire more than you need. We must check that. This is what is required for your purpose, and therefore we will grant you the request as to what is required for what you want to do."

Mr. MILLER. This is an application by a prospective lessee.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Precisely.

Mr. MILLER. To secure information. The information may be of two kinds—one kind that he will himself want to enable him to determine whether he wants to take the lease, and the other may be information required by the department. Surely the word "desired" comprehends information that the man would want or the corporation, and also information that the department might want, but the word "required" is vastly more restrictive. Now, just one word further—I appreciate I am using the gentleman's time.

Mr. FERGUSSON. The gentleman is welcome to it. I have already made the point I desired to make.

Mr. MILLER. I can not conceive of anything that a prospective lessee could want with a permit to go upon Government land in connection with a project other than to ascertain the amount of water, the rainfall in the basin, the amount of flowage of the stream, the accessibility in respect to building dams and getting highways in there, and possibility of the marketing of it, and so on, all reasonable public purposes in the case I present. Now, can the gentleman explain in what way some prospective lessee might want to go on the land and get information that the Secretary would not want him to get?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Not at all.

Mr. MILLER. Then, why is not the word "desired" much preferable?

Mr. FERGUSSON. If the word "required" is used, it still leaves him the right to go and get all the information he might want that he could not get otherwise than from the experts of the Secretary, who is presumed, through his experts, to know the capacity, possibility, and all the features of all of these prospects. Now, the word "desired," it seems to me, gives too much power to the applicant and leaves too little to the discretion of the Secretary, while the word "required" covers the whole business. He can get all the information he wants, but he must content himself with what the Secretary finally determines is required in closing up the lease, if he is to get one.

Mr. MILLER. The only difference, it seems to me, between the position of the gentleman from New Mexico and myself is what this word "desired" does or can do. I think the word "desired" does and can do, and what the word "desired" can not do I think the word "required" can not do.

Mr. FERGUSSON. The gentleman is welcome to his opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the conference report on the ship-registry bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the conference report on the ship-registry bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do that for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee for an explanation of one feature of this bill. On page 2 occurs the phrase, "which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided, but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms." Now, I will ask the chairman of the committee if there is any provision other than this breach of any terms of the leases in this bill for which a lease may be revoked?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the bill is so broad in its scope and the Secretary is given such unbounded authority to work out rules and regulations, which are incorporated in the leasing contract, which is really the most effective place to incorporate the regulations, prohibitions, restraints, and safeguards because in that event not only the Government is bound but the applicant is bound. He can then make the rules, regulations, safeguards, and so forth, that will protect the public. The exact authority so to do is provided for in one of the later sections. For instance, let me read on page 10, section 13:

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

Another section provides the Secretary may incorporate into the lease every regulation that the department, its engineers, and all agree may be desirable in the public interest. Furthermore there is a forfeiture clause in the event of a failure to comply with the terms of the act.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, that is getting back simply to this section. That is the section which says the leases may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms. Now, does not the gentleman think as a wise provision here that the phrase "which lease shall be irrevocable except as herein provided," ought to be eliminated from this measure?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, surely not; because every authority who came before us, and Secretary Fisher was very pronounced in his opinion, and I must read the gentleman what he says; he contended that it would be subject to the same objection as the present revocable permit law which has been the stumbling block to all of them. Let me read you what Secretary Fisher says on page 12 of the hearings just had:

Now, the revocable feature in a permit not only works to the disadvantage of the promotor and developer and investor, but it will also work to the disadvantage of the public. It is perfectly clear that the public ought not and can not, if the permit is revocable, exact such terms and conditions as it otherwise could and should from a man. In many cases we may have a theoretical right to do a thing we do not exercise. If this provision is in the bill you can not expect the permittee, under those circumstances, to make the same sort of a contract with you that he otherwise would. In my opinion it will work out far worse for the public than it will for the water-power man, because the water-power man knows that, as a matter of fact, his permit is not likely to be revoked.

That is on the identical clause to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to this feature: Who can bring the suit to revoke the lease—the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. FERRIS. A citizen.

Mr. CULLOP. A citizen can not act under this and bring a suit; he is not a party to this lease. There is where the trouble comes in reference to this provision. You are lodging in the Secretary of the Interior enormous discretionary power by this bill. If the Secretary of the Interior is all right in protecting the public interests, in protecting the interests of the Government, then it is all right; but if he is not right in protecting the country and the public and the interest of the people, then what is the condition? It is all wrong. In the last analysis it all depends on what kind of a man the Secretary of the Interior is; upon him the whole thing depends for success or failure, for weal or woe. With him is lodged great authority for the administration of this measure.

No private citizen can come in and bring a suit to cancel one of these leases, no matter how extraordinary the proposition may be. He will have no standing in court; he is not known to the transaction, not a party to the contract, and hence could not be heard, however much he might desire and however anxious and willing he might be to protect the public and enhance the public interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move to amend by adding the words "of the Interior" after the word "Secretary," in line 1, page 3.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that ought to be agreed to, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, after the word "Secretary," in line 2, add the words "of the Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. My purpose in making that motion is to inquire whether it is proposed to grant unlimited time for the renewals of these permits under the phraseology of this section. You limit the preliminary permit to one year in duration, and then provide that it may, however, upon application, be extended by the Secretary without any limitation whatsoever as to its length. I hardly think the committee intended to have the extension after the expiration of the first year unlimited in extent.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has stated the facts as they are and drawn the correct inference from the language. As I said earlier in the afternoon, it developed in the hearings that in some instances the surveys and the preliminary steps to be taken in these water-power concerns aggregated over a million dollars. In fact, several engineers called our attention to several projects that had exceeded that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I heard the chairman's statement as to that several times.

Mr. FERRIS. If a man in good faith held a temporary permit and had proceeded as best he could for 11 or 12 months, and had his proposition 95 per cent closed, we thought the Secretary ought to have a little latitude.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are granting the Secretary not only limited latitude, but unlimited latitude, because there is no limit of time on the extension. He might abuse his authority by tying up all the water powers indefinitely, and we would not be able to stop it. Why should we not limit that extension at least a year, so that other persons who might wish to develop the water power might be given the opportunity in case the first applicant would not be willing to proceed. The Secretary of the Interior might use this as a cloak to keep the water power from being developed.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman wanted to offer an amendment to that effect I do not think any member of the committee would seriously object to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wanted to get the chairman's opinion in regard to it. I have an amendment here.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman understands that there may be some water powers in Alaska that may or may not be needed soon, but in the event they were needed the climatic conditions, railroad facilities, and the frozen condition of the country at certain periods of the year might make it a hardship to live up to this proposition if you put in a hard-and-fast rule——

Mr. STAFFORD. Within two years any promoting concern that has bona fide capital back of it will know whether or not it is going to be a going concern and will be able to have their plans consummated so that it will be a working affair, but without any limitation you give unlimited discretion to perpetuate the temporary permit for 10 or 15 years.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw the pro forma amendment and offer the following amendment instead.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "extended," insert "for another period of not exceeding one year."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to limit the debate on this amendment to 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to limit the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto to 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we should give to the Secretary of the Interior unlimited authority so that he can grant temporary permits in perpetuity.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. For a question.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that in lines 2, 3, 4, and 5 it fixes the limitations themselves?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very reason I wish to have some limitation on this authority, so that it can not be abused. You are proceeding under the idea that the Secretary of the Interior will pass upon all these provisions, when we know that the matter will be in charge of subordinates. If we knew that the Secretary of the Interior would absolutely pass upon these—we know that that can not be the fact, as he is too busily occupied—it would be different. You authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a temporary permit so that promoters may be able to make a survey and examination and see whether it is practicable to develop the water power, and then, after the first permit, you allow him to go ahead and extend it ad libitum. No such power should be granted to any Secretary of the Interior, no matter how much we may believe he is looking after the public interest. There should be some limit on his discretion. Here you have no limit whatever. You allow the Secretary of the Interior to abuse the discretion vested in him. I can not see, if one year is not enough, why you do not agree to two years; but at least put some limit on his discretion. This bill is full of absolute authority that is going to be delegated to him. I believe there should be some more limitations put upon his authority, that Congress should show its position on these matters, and not leave it to the unlimited discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is right when he says that this lodges great power in the Secretary of the Interior; but if his amendment were adopted it would be the means in many instances of retarding water-power development instead of facilitating it. The gentleman must not forget that over many of these propositions there will be a great many contests. They will get into the courts. They will drag their weary way through the courts, and if the Secretary of the Interior could not extend the time more than one year many designing persons would defeat well-intending persons in procuring these leases and constructing these water powers. Instances of condemnation proceedings in the courts may be had and delays occasioned. All these things are probable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following out the logic of the gentleman's statement, the 20-year limit that he advocates would all be taken up in litigation.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, no; it would not. The gentleman is badly mistaken. It would not be taken up in litigation. Laws of that kind have been in practical operation in some States, and they have secured the very best of results.

The trouble about some gentlemen who are opposing those laws is because they strike down monopoly, and they seem unwilling to have that done. But if only one year's extension should be granted, some person who wanted to defeat the project could bring a suit in court, and before it would work its weary way through the court of last resort the time would expire and the project would fail for that reason.

One year's extension may not be sufficient. I do not think that the gentleman would contend that any Secretary of the Interior under any President that we have ever had or might have in this country would abuse the right in the manner in which some suggest; would abuse his powers to the detriment of the American people.

This is a most opportune time for the people of this great country. The unfortunate conditions to-day in Europe—the only competitor of this country in the commercial world—are such that they will bring greater stimulus and activity upon American production in the next year or two to come. These plants will begin to develop. Men will struggle to get possession of them. They will put impediments in the way of other men who are getting possession of them. They will retard the work and defeat the great purpose of this bill if such a limitation as the gentleman has proposed should be adopted here to-day. It is full of danger, and it is a stroke at the great benefits which this bill proposes to confer on the American people; and I hope the gentleman's amendment will be voted down. The conditions all over Europe, our great competitor in commerce, in manufacture, in all production, are such that her commerce, her mills, her factories, and her production are idle, and the men to operate them are in the field to do battle to save from dissolution the Government to which they owe allegiance, and her production must cease, yet her consumption, because of her condition, will increase. We, necessarily, will have the opportunity to supply their increased demands, and it will furnish us the greatest opportunity ever known to any country. We must be ready to meet the demand. It will give us the opportunity to capture the commerce of the world, and we should so manage the condition thrust upon us that we may retain it for years to come. We are able to cope with the condition, meet the requirements, and supply the demands. Let us do nothing in this or any other legislation we may enact which will embarrass us in taking advantage of the splendid opportunities cast upon us. However much we may deplore the unfortunate situation of Europe, we are not responsible for it in any manner, and must take care of the situation as best we can in our country. Our people are capable of exerting every effort to increase our production to meet the increased demands which will be made upon us. It is most essential that we do nothing which will retard the development of these great enterprises which are soon to play a most important part in our capacity of increasing production and meeting the great requirements which all know will be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "thereof," insert "who have acquired, under the laws of the State or Territory having jurisdiction over the same, the right to divert and use the waters intended to be utilized for the development of power."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is an exceedingly important amendment. It goes to the very bottom of the larger questions involved, and I hope that I may have 10 minutes in which to discuss the matter. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to close debate at the end of 15 minutes on this amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman from Wyoming if he intends to discuss the constitutional features of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Partly, but not entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] amends the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] by asking that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes, 10 of which shall be occupied by the gentleman from Wyoming. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MILLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the constitutional features of this bill very briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut withdraws the point of no quorum, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered would simply place in the bill the recognition of a condition that must be met before the Secretary can properly give anyone the right to develop an enterprise under this bill. There should be the widest opportunity to secure the right to develop these water powers, but we must remember that unless this bill as it becomes a law and as the courts construe it shall entirely overturn what we understand to be the relative jurisdiction of the States and of the National Government, no one can develop any one of these water powers who has not secured a water right from the State. There can be no question about that. Of course there may be gentlemen who believe that some day the courts will decide that that is not the law; but until such a decision is rendered, that is the situation. Those who shall secure the right to develop one of these water powers will be those who have the right from the State to divert the water for that particular purpose at that particular place. That is not only the law, but that is a wise and useful law. It does not tend to monopoly, because one securing that right to divert and appropriate must proceed to initiate and develop his enterprise, and must continue diligently; so it places the State right alongside of the Secretary of the Interior as an additional force to compel development.

If the bill is adopted in its present form there should be no question but what the Secretary will feel it necessary, as he considers it necessary under all of the present right-of-way acts, to make the possession of a water right a prerequisite to the granting of a lease. That is the practice to-day under the right-of-way acts. The law gives to the citizen a right of way, but the Secretary can not approve it until the citizen has secured the right from the State to divert the water. Therefore this amendment may not be necessary, but I think it ought to go into the bill in order to remove any doubt as to what is our intent in legislating. And it is all the more necessary by reason of this fact, a fact that has not been referred to in this five-minute debate so far, except briefly by the gentleman from Indiana. I referred to it in my speech under general debate. The great power the bill confers on the Secretary of the Interior. This bill is the absolute limit of federalism, centralization, and bureaucracy. Certainly never under this Government, and I doubt if anywhere under the sun, except in an absolute bureaucracy, has any one single official of a Government ever been given power and authority such as the Secretary of the Interior is given under this act. If in the days of Secretary Ballinger any committee had brought a bill like this on the floor of the House they would have been hooted and run out of the building. Why, we brought in here a leasing bill for leasing the coal lands in Alaska during those days, and the only discretion lodged in the Secretary was the discretion to decide between two applicants having practically the same claim or right. That bill was defeated because it lodged too much authority in the Secretary of the Interior. And now here is a bill, as the bill was reported, which practically said to the Secretary of the Interior, "We turn over to you all of the public lands of the United States that may ever be needed by anyone for the development of water power, to do as you please, to grant or withhold, to fix under whatever terms and conditions you see fit, to deny the right for any reason which seems good to you or for no reason at all, to grant to one man although another would be perfectly willing to pay more and agree to more advantageous terms."

The gentleman from Indiana asked the question a moment ago whether there were any conditions under which the Secretary could deny this right. He would have been more logical if he had asked whether there were any conditions under which the Secretary must grant a lease. There are none. No man or corporation, municipal or otherwise, under the flag can ever do anything or any number of things, or can place himself in any position of good faith or of ability to perform service which will compel the Secretary of the Interior to grant a right or lease. The Secretary can deny a man on account of the color of his hair or the way he spells his name, because of his political or religious faith or because he has none, or for any reason or for no reason at all; and that is what the gentleman calls regulating in the interest of the people. If this were Russia instead of the United States, I should not be specially surprised at this bill. I have great faith in the present Secretary of the Interior, but he will not be Secretary always, and, in any event, no one man should have the power this bill grants.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. If this amendment is adopted, it will practically defeat any leasing of the land for the purposes of the bill, will it not?

Mr. MONDELL. It will not, and the gentleman knows it will not, because he knows perfectly well that whether this amendment is adopted or not, no man can legally proceed to the development of one of these water powers on the public lands in his State or in my State or in Colorado, unless he has this right from the State to divert the water. Knowing that, I can not understand why the gentleman propounds that interrogatory.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Is not the adoption of your amendment, or language similar, absolutely necessary in order to protect purchasers of power from plants operating under leases?

Mr. MONDELL. Why, certainly; because, after all, the base and bottom of the entire enterprise is the right to use the water, and without that right fixed and secured the enterprise is valueless as an investment. Further, I am not arguing this simply because it is the situation and therefore we insist upon its recognition, but because it is wise that it is the situation. For that control of the water by the people of the State in the arid States of the West is what gives the foundation to the right of public control. Out there in that arid country there is no question about the right of the people to control the use of the water, to regulate how it shall be used, and when and where it shall be used.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. A further question: In the absence of language such as you have indicated and in case these power companies fail to secure those water rights, would not their rights be subordinate to water rights that might be secured afterwards by individuals?

Mr. MONDELL. Why, certainly; the gentleman is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume only a minute. If the amendment be adopted it is doubtful if anyone would want ever to try to acquire rights in a State to develop water power. Certainly the House wants to do no such silly thing as that. Section 14, on page 10, contains a provision exactly identical with the one in the reclamation law with reference to the protection of State water rights and irrigation matters.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield. The gentleman has had time in which to discuss the matter. Section 14 we clipped verbatim from the reclamation act, so that there could be no infringement upon anyone having rights under the law, but surely no one would want to say that the scope of this bill shall be confined to those only who had water rights already acquired.

Mr. MONDELL. But my amendment has nothing to do with water rights already acquired.

Mr. FERRIS. I think I understand the amendment. I do not intend to misquote the gentleman's amendment, neither do I intend to misquote him, nor do I believe I do. The gentleman offers an amendment, and instead of talking to his amendment spends his time in railing against the bill. I fear the gentleman does not want this bill to pass. I fear the gentleman does not want anything like it to pass. I gather his desire is to let water power pass into private ownership and thereby escape Federal regulation. Many good men harbor that desire and believe that to be the proper method. But I am so certain the House does not want to do that, and I again feel sure Congress does not want to do that, and I can not think the country wants to do that, and the gentleman himself ought not to want to do that. To my mind water-power sites is one thing that we ought to hold on to, at least so far as the fee is concerned. The word "lease," when dealing with water power, does not scare me. It is the thing that ought to be done. It is the only thing that will be done, and we all should join hands in doing it right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "development," strike out all of line 25 on page 2 and all of lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and that portion of line 5 ending with the word "permittee" on page 3.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the effect of the language that is now in the bill. An amendment was offered a short time ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin limiting the time of the permit to go upon the premises for the purpose of getting data to an extension of one year, and that was voted down. The amendment which I offer, if adopted, will simply give the Secretary of the Interior the power to give such permit as he sees fit, and I submit in all candor that the language of the bill as it is written means just what my amendment would make it mean. If you adopt the amendment which I offer, it means that the Secretary may grant a permit to go upon the premises and secure data for such length of time as it pleases him to make. Under the bill the committee is considering, the Secretary of the Interior may grant a permit to go upon the premises, which permit shall be for one year. At the expiration of that year the Secretary of the Interior is permitted to extend that permit for such time as he sees fit. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin ought to have been adopted, unless you want to give the Secretary of the Interior unlimited power. It has been stated and restated in this debate that the purpose of this bill, and its main purpose, is to break up a monopoly of the use, sale, and development of hydroelectric energy. What greater monopoly can you have than to place the hydroelectric development of this country in the hands of a single individual, without any restrictions whatsoever, the power not only to lease for a term of 50 years, upon such terms and conditions as that individual may care to exact, all of the great water powers on the public domain of this country, but to also regulate the services and charges to the consumer for the electric energy that may be developed from such water powers? No Government, to my knowledge, has ever vested such vast power in one man without at least the right to review his act by appeal or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 13, after the word "forests," insert the words "the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the House in its wisdom a short time ago struck out all reference to national monuments in this bill. I have consulted with the gentleman who made the motion by which this action was taken, and the amendment I now offer is agreeable to him. It makes this bill apply to the two largest national monuments that there are in the United States. There have been created by presidential proclamation 31 national monuments, aggregating about a million and a half acres in area. Twenty-eight of them include but 100,000 acres, whereas the Grand Canyon Monument contains over 800,000 acres and the Mount Olympus over 600,000 acres. I have no desire to disturb any of these smaller monuments created under the law, and properly so, but these two large monuments that do contain water-power sites ought to come under the provisions of this bill. There is no reason why they should not, and I have offered the amendment with that idea in mind.

Of the 31 national monuments that have been created, 8 are located in Arizona. Four of them are designed to protect from vandalism the remaining evidences of a prehistoric race that at one time occupied the area now included within my State. The Casa Grande ruin, in Pinal County, was discovered by Padre Kino, a Jesuit missionary, in 1694, and is the most important ruin of its type in the Southwest. Montezuma's Castle is a picturesque assemblage of cliff dwellings located on Beaver Creek, in Yavapai County. The Navajo National Monument is located on the Indian reservation of that name in northern Arizona, and consists of two extensive pueblo or cliff-dwelling ruins. The Tonto Monument is about 5 miles southeasterly from the Roosevelt Dam, and consists of cliff dwellings situated in the entrance of a large shallow cavern.

Ten acres have been set aside in the Santa Cruz Valley near Nogales, Ariz., on which is located a very ancient Spanish mission, called Tumacacori, now in partial ruin. I have endeavored to obtain an appropriation for the preservation of this historic edifice, but without success.

Three other tracts of land have been reserved as national monuments in Arizona under that part of the act for the preservation of American antiquities which provides for the creation of national monuments to preserve objects of scientific interest. The Papago Saguaro National Monument was established by presidential proclamation on January 31, 1914, and includes about 2,000 acres of land in the vicinity of the Hole-in-the-Rock, north of Tempe, in Maricopa County. The celebrated petrified forest of Arizona lies in the area between the Little Colorado River and the Rio Puerco, in Apache and Navajo Counties. This monument is readily accessible from Adamana, on the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad. It includes over 25,000 acres of land, but, so far as I am aware, possesses no available water-power site. The same can be said of all of the other national monuments in Arizona which I have just mentioned.

The Grand Canyon National Monument vastly exceeds in area all of the other national monuments in the United States. In fact, this monument contains more than one-half of the area that has been withdrawn from entry under the authority of the act that I have just cited. This part of the canyon was originally included within the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, and, as a matter of fact, a considerable portion of it is covered by three different proclamations—one creating the forest reserve, one a game preserve, embracing that part of the national forest north of the river, and the third a monument proclamation.

The Mount Olympus National Monument is nearly as large as the Grand Canyon Monument, and I do know that both of them contain water power that ought to be developed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman realize that when you designate two special monuments and except some thirty others you are indulging in class legislation, and should not the gentleman advance some pretty strong argument to justify such a position?

Mr. HAYDEN. But I have advanced a strong argument in that the two monuments that I have named contain enormous areas of land, and in each of them there is water power. We do not know whether or not there is any water power in the smaller monuments, but if there is and its development would interfere with the antiquities contained therein, then it should not be utilized. The use of the water power in the Mount Olympus and Grand Canyon Monuments would not interfere with our enjoyment of any of the beauties of nature. That was the case in the Hetch Hetchy bill, which we debated at great length in this House not long ago. This is a parallel case.

These two national monuments, by reason of their great area and from the fact that both contain power sites, ought to be included under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has referred to the consideration of the Hetch Hetchy proposition. So far as it relates to the Grand Canyon there were some who voted with some reservation in favor of that proposition for fear it might impair somewhat the scenic value——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I can not see why we should make an exception of this particular character in this bill. The gentleman's statement is that in the consideration of the Hetch Hetchy it developed that it would not impair any of the scenic beauty. Those who opposed that proposition, I think, strongly believed that it would impair the scenic beauties of that park to some extent. Unless some better reason is advanced by the gentleman why we should indulge in class legislation and single out these two monuments for special consideration I shall feel constrained to make the point of order. Another reason why we should not single out two propositions is that it will be a warrant for another body not only to include those two but to include all national monuments. The committee deliberately, after full consideration at the session the other day and to-day, voted to exclude national monuments from the provisions of this bill, and now the gentleman comes in, because perhaps he is somewhat interested in one of these projects near his State—and I do not blame him for it, but only praise him—and wishes to make an exception. I do not think that is very good legislation.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me that the reasons are ample why an exception should be made in the case of these two monuments, because it appears upon the face of the record that they are both of enormous area and water-power sites are known to exist within their boundaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. This question was considered this morning by the committee, and the committee deliberately struck out national monuments, and I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order, this question having heretofore been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was called out for a moment. I believe this amendment is an amendment that provides in reference to the Grand Canyon and one other——

Mr. HAYDEN. The Mount Olympus National Monument, in the State of Washington.

Mr. MANN. Shall come within the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman in reference to the Grand Canyon. That is now under whose control?

Mr. HAYDEN. Under the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. And the other the same?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is administered in the same way.

Mr. MANN. Under the terms of this bill the Secretary of the Interior would not have the authority to grant a temporary permit or a permanent lease without the consent of the Secretary of Agriculture and a certificate that it is not interfering with the scenic beauty of the property.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman states the exact intention of the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture must make a finding that the creation or use of water power within these monuments will not injure or destroy or be inconsistent with the purposes for which they were created.

Mr. MANN. How long is the national monument reservation at the Grand Canyon?

Mr. HAYDEN. My recollection is that it extends along the Colorado River for about 50 miles, 25 miles each way from the Bright Angel Trail.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how much fall the water has?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have been at the bottom of the canyon and I know there are rapids in the river, but I can not state what the amount of fall per mile is.

Mr. MANN. Is it possible to construct a dam so as to have a reservoir or a lake so it would be quite valuable?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no doubt of it. Such a scheme has been proposed at different times. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Colorado River offers the only opportunity for the people of my State to obtain any benefit under this act. It is the only large river in Arizona, and if the power possibilities of this stream are not made available for use, then, so far as the people of my State are concerned, this bill might as well not be passed.

Mr. MONDELL. How does this national monument, or any other national monument, come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture? My recollection is that the national monuments are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAYDEN. The last annual report of the Secretary of the Interior shows that there are 10 national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, 10 under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and 2 under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War.

For the information of the House I shall insert in the RECORD a table containing data relative to all of the national monuments that have been created by presidential proclamations.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not understand how they get under the jurisdiction of these different officials. My understanding is, the law placed national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HAYDEN. The act of June 8, 1906, says:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to declare by public proclamation historic landmarks, historic and prehistoric structures, and other objects of historic and scientific interest that are situated upon the lands owned or controlled by the Government of the United States to be national monuments, and may reserve as a part thereof parcels of land, the limits of which in all cases shall be confined to the smallest area compatible with the proper care and management of the objects to be protected.

I rather think the distinguished gentleman who was President of the United States at that time stretched the law considerably when he created a national monument containing 800,000 acres in Arizona and 600,000 acres in the State of Washington, but he did it, and these great areas are now included in such monuments.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Is it not probable that this came under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture because they were under forest reserves, and therefore under his jurisdiction at the time they were decreed as national monuments?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think that is the way it came about.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. The gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Illinois made reference to some phraseology which I believe has been heretofore eliminated in the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE]. The gentleman read the bill as its exists, yet in the amendment as voted this morning, as I understand the amendment, we eliminated the words "national monument," in lines 12 and 15, on pages 12. So that in case the provision is adopted we will have to restore that language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to perfect the bill it will be necessary to reinsert the words "national monument," in line 12, page 2, and in line 15, on page 2—of course referring to only these two national monuments. I ask unanimous consent to make that change, namely, to reinsert those words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to insert the words "national monument," in line 12, page 2, after the word "forest," and in line 15, page 2, before the words "or reservation." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all of line 7, and in line 8 strike out the word "their," and after the word "terms," in line 8, insert the words "of the lease or of this act," so that the language will read: "Which lease shall be declared null and void upon breach of any of the terms of the lease or of this act."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment at the end of 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the language with which this amendment deals refers entirely to the lease of the property. Line 7 provides that the lease shall not be revoked except as "herein provided." There is no provision in the terms of this paragraph for the revocation of the lease except the following, "but which may be declared null and void upon breach of any of their terms." Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the members of the committee and also of the members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the fact that the only provision in this section that gives the right to interfere with the lease is this language, "but which may be declared null and void upon a breach of any of its terms." The language just above, in lines 6 and 7, "which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided," does not strengthen the bill at all. It does not protect the lessee in anywise whatever, because there is nothing in the bill affecting the right of a lease after it is granted unless there should be a violation of the terms of the lease. While you do not provide that it may be disturbed by a violation of the terms of the act, my amendment adds that much to the language of the bill. I have conferred with a number of the gentlemen who are on the committee, and most of them as far as I can learn agree that the amendment is proper and ought to be adopted, yet I understand there are a few of them who think there is reserve power somewhere in this bill affecting the lease that might be disturbed in some way if this language of the amendment were inserted. I mean the language to the effect that it shall not be revoked unless there is a violation of the terms of the act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I say, I think that to strike out line 7 would strengthen the bill, and make it more explicit, and clear up its ambiguity. No action can be taken by the courts unless there should be a violation of the terms of the lease or a violation of the terms of the act. This fixes the terms definitely, both for the lessee and the court.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman feel that in adding the words "of this act" he narrows the grounds on which the lease might be terminated? As it is now, the lease can be terminated by a violation of any of the terms on which it is granted, and part of those terms are not of this act, but in the permit.

Mr. FOWLER. All the power in the bill might not be incorporated in the lease. If the provisions of the law are violated, we should provide for a revocation of the lease; and if the terms of the lease are violated, we should also provide for the revocation of the lease.

Mr. BRYAN. The Secretary can fix the rate that can be charged, and if they charge above that the lease will be subject to forfeiture, because it is a part of the terms that the Secretary can regulate them. But if you permit them to revoke on the violation of the terms of this act, you narrow the authority of the Secretary.

Mr. FOWLER. The amendment provides that the lease may be revoked or declared null and void if the lessee should violate any of the terms of the lease or any of the terms of the act itself. That is the intent and spirit of the amendment, and it should be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up any more time.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the very object and purpose of this provision is to cover the inefficient, unworkable, unreasonable, unjust law now upon the statute books, that gives the power to the Secretary of the Interior to revoke a permit that a man has for the development of water power after he has expended large sums of money upon it. Everyone that appeared before the committee, without a dissenting voice—every one of those who had experience in the matter—opposed the proposition of putting that back as it is now—that miserable makeshift—revocable permit. The gentleman's amendment puts it back so that the leases may be revocable, and may be declared null and void under the provisions of the act.

Now, mind you, look at the language as it reads here—"which leases shall be irrevocable except as herein provided." It ought to be that way. A man spends his time and his money. He has been given that lease. He ought to have the right to know that it should not be revocable unless the provisions of the lease have been violated, as well as the terms and the conditions provided in the bill. But it may be declared null and void upon breach of the terms of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] now wants to change it so as to read "from the terms of this act."

Mr. FOWLER. No; the terms of the lease and the act, both.

Mr. RAKER. Whereas the provision of the bill is that as to all the rules and regulations, those wholesome conditions that may be placed in the lease by the Secretary of the Interior and consented to by the lessee, if they are violated, then in a court of competent jurisdiction that lease may be declared null and void. But at no time and under no circumstances ought this Congress again permit legislation to make leases revocable. It has been the law heretofore.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. It is upon the statute books to-day. It has retarded and prevented development. It is preventing development to-day. The gentleman from Illinois wants to say that after we have given this time and consideration to this measure for the purpose of giving relief to the people we should go back now and continue the old law in a different form, and make the statute read so that these leases may be revocable, instead of giving them a fixed term and a fixed price under conditions that they know and understand.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Under the terms of the bill, under what conditions could the lease be revoked?

Mr. RAKER. It depends on the language of the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Where?

Mr. RAKER. I have not the time to go over it and explain. I answered, "under the terms of the bill."

Mr. FOWLER. What terms of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. I have answered the gentleman's question. I have not time to go into details. That is sufficient. The act says, "which lease shall be irrevocable except as herein provided."

Mr. FOWLER. Wherein violated?

Mr. RAKER. Where the lessee has violated it. Where he has done things prohibited in the lease; where he has entered into monopolistic agreements. There is some chance to act under that. But it appears to me that you might just as well defeat any hopes of legislation that will give capital an opportunity for investment if you are going to give a revocable permit and a revocable lease. Let us not lose our heads entirely upon the question of giving men who want to develop these powers some opportunity. You might just as well defeat outright the hopes of the West for the development of these water powers if you are going again to give a revocable permit and a revocable lease.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. What is the difference between a revocable lease and a revocable permit, with the power granted to the lessor, at his pleasure, at his will, and at his caprice, without reason, without law, to say, "I do not like the way you are doing, and I therefore revoke your lease."

Now I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from California that section 2 is very explicit in its language, giving information as to the terms of the lease and the reasons for which it might be revoked.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. It provides for the diligent, orderly, and reasonable development and continuous operation, and any failure of the lessee to carry out those provisions would work a revocation of the lease.

Mr. RAKER. I say, it subjects it to the mere caprice of one man. He may say, "You did not dig your ditch at the right angle; you did not give it the right elevation; you did not give it the right pitch; you left a few pine trees along the bank on the left side, when somebody said they should be removed; you did not build a concrete conduit at the proper place." Under the provisions of the proposed amendment the Secretary of the Interior may revoke your lease, and therefore you would lose your right and your opportunity. The judgment and final determination of the committee was that the revocable permit—that will-o'-the-wisp—should be ended forever. The West wants development. Give it a fair chance and it will do it. A development of one part of the Nation is an assistance to the whole country. Give capital, brains, and industry a chance to come together. It will benefit all. Let them build up their enterprises; then regulate them. Proper regulations will settle the whole trouble. Deliver us from the revocable permit. The amendment should be voted down. I hope the House will support the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. To change the word "lease" wherever it occurs in the amendment to the word "leases."

Mr. FOWLER. I accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman, from the singular to the plural. I think it is a proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute the word "leases" for the word "lease" wherever it occurs in the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question being taken, Mr. FOWLER asked for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 19.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto do now close. I do not want to cut off amendments, but I do not think we ought to debate this another day, and afterwards I want to move that the committee rise.

Mr. FOWLER. I have one other amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum of the committee present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw that point, and ask the gentleman from Oklahoma to move that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. All the gentleman has to do is to move to rise.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISCOUNTS OF ACCEPTANCES BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 15038) proposing an amendment to the Federal reserve act relative to acceptances, and for other purposes, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13, paragraphs 3, 4, and 5, of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may discount acceptances which are based on the importation or exportation of goods and which have a maturity at time of discount of not more than six months and indorsed by at least one member bank. The amount of acceptances so discounted shall at no time exceed one-half the paid-up capital stock and surplus of the bank for which the rediscounts are made, except by authority of the Federal Reserve Board, and under such regulations as said board may prescribe.

"The aggregate of such notes and bills bearing the signature of indorsement of any one person, company, firm, or corporation rediscounted for any one bank shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the unimpaired capital and surplus of said bank, but this restriction shall not apply to the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values.

"Any member bank may accept drafts or bills of exchange drawn upon it and growing out of transactions involving the importation or exportation of goods having not more than six months' sight to run, but no bank shall accept such bills to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than one-half of its paid-up capital stock and surplus, except by authority of the Federal Reserve Board, under such regulations as said board may prescribe."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman ought to explain to the House what change this makes, so that we will understand it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to amend three paragraphs of the Federal reserve act so as to facilitate the financing of the exportation of cotton, grain, and other products of this country. As the act stands, it puts a limitation upon the amount of discounts that any regional reserve bank or member bank may make of acceptances based upon the exportation or importation of goods. The limitation is one-half of the capital stock and unimpaired surplus of the bank. The proposition of this amendment is to invest the Federal Reserve Board with power to suspend this limitation from time to time, in its discretion. It was ascertained by the organization committee of the Federal reserve banking system that there have grown up in this country quite a number of banking institutions that make a specialty of financing the exportation of grain, cotton, and other products, and these banks have built up a large business—a very much greater business than the limitation contained in the law would accommodate. The banks in question complained of this limitation, and I introduced this bill on the 25th of March last; but I did not press it, because there seemed to be no immediate demand for action pending the organization of the Federal reserve system. But now, with this European war confronting us, it is desired by the Federal Reserve Board to facilitate in every possible way the exportation of our grain, cotton, and other products, and this is a simple proposition to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to suspend this limitation upon the amount of acceptances that an individual bank may discount or that the regional banks may rediscount.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. FARR. What is the limitation on?

Mr. GLASS. An amount equal to one-half of the capital stock and surplus of the bank.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that the only change that has been made, or is there a change in respect to the duration?

Mr. GLASS. There is one other change, as to the duration. The law now provides that the regional reserve bank may discount these acceptances with a maturity of three months. The individual bank may discount acceptances with a maturity of six months; but the individual banks in such case will have to carry these discounted bills for three months before they are available for rediscount at the regional reserve bank, and we propose to alter that so as to permit the regional reserve bank to rediscount these six months' bills immediately.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the regional reserve bank may rediscount them immediately upon their presentation by the original bank?

Mr. GLASS. That is true. The reason for this is that it was testified before the committee by gentlemen having close contact with our export trade that it required six months to consummate a business engagement of that sort with the Orient and with the South American countries.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I understand the gentleman's explanation, these changes would have been suggested regardless of the present European situation, but that situation merely makes it more desirable to hasten the changes.

Mr. GLASS. That situation has accentuated the desirability for the change.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the theory which actuated the committee in having the original bank of discount hold the paper six months before having it rediscounted by the regional reserve bank?

Mr. GLASS. I can do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to make the gentleman enter into any elaborate statement. If it will do so, I will withdraw the query.

Mr. GLASS. We were engaged in quite a controversy in the Democratic caucus over the maturity of agricultural paper. Under the rediscount clause of the bill agricultural paper had but 90 days to run. The point was made by some member of the caucus that we were extending to the banks a six months' privilege that we did not extend to the individual farmer. We did not seem able to explain to the satisfaction of that member that conditions were different, and that these six months were necessary to consummate export transactions with the Orient and with the South American Republics, but not necessary to close up domestic transactions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the gentleman, there was really no reason for carrying the original limitation?

Mr. GLASS. Not in my opinion.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. CANTOR. Does the Federal Reserve Board favor this measure?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I bring it up at the suggestion of members of the Federal Reserve Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what objection is there to the Committee on Banking and Currency considering this bill?

Mr. GLASS. There is no objection, Mr. Speaker, except that there is not a quorum of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the city. I have made an effort to consult such members as are here—I did not happen to see the member from Arkansas—but I have seen five or six of the majority members and three or four of the minority members, and have submitted the matter to the minority leader and the majority leader, all of whom concur. I have done everything possible to make things agreeable.

Mr. WINGO. There is a majority of the committee, including the Republicans, in the city—a majority of two—or within a few hours' call of the city; and as the gentleman proposes by this bill to take the limit off absolutely, that is quite the effect of it. The gentleman takes off the limitations now in the present law in paragraphs—I believe they are 4 and 5 which the gentleman amends——

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Section 13.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas the proposition does not take the limitation off. It authorizes the Federal Reserve Board, in its discretion, to suspend the limitation.

Mr. WINGO. Of course it removes all legislative limitation entirely. Under the proposed change the Federal Reserve Board can let one of these banks handle these foreign bills of exchange to the extent of 125 or 200 per cent of the capital and surplus.

Mr. GLASS. It is a discretion which the Federal Reserve Board may exercise.

Mr. WINGO. I think that a matter of this importance ought to be considered by the committee, and in addition there are other amendments which Members would like to consider.

Mr. GLASS. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the effort recently made to get the committee together on propositions more vital than this failed; and as I shall be compelled to leave Washington this evening for several days, owing to a death in my family, I do not think it is practicable to attempt to get a committee meeting.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Is this urged now because this is a war emergency?

Mr. GLASS. Well, I introduced the bill last March. It is urged right now because an emergency has arisen in the matter of marketing abroad cotton, grain, and other crops.

Mr. COOPER. I noticed it was introduced the 25th of last March, long antedating the war scare, and I wondered what the emergency was at this time.

Mr. GLASS. It is simply thought very desirable at this time upon representations made by the American banks which have been in the habit of financing our export trade.

Mr. COOPER. Why did not you provide for it in the original currency bill?

Mr. GLASS. We did; but there is a limitation in the original currency bill on the amount the bank may accept in this foreign trade, and this amendment proposes to give the Federal Reserve Board the discretion to suspend the limitation.

Mr. COOPER. Did not the importance of the proposed amendment occur to the committee, or had it been called to their attention when the bill was introduced or after that?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, the matter was discussed in the committee and in the caucus and in the House; but as the business of exceptances was something new to our financial system the caucus and the House thought we would better be cautious about it in the beginning. The Federal Reserve Board thinks now that this would very largely facilitate the financing of the cotton, grain, and other export crops.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Is there any emergency as regards money in this present situation? Is it not a matter of ships in which to export our goods?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but what would be the use of getting shipping facilities if we should not also be able to finance the crops? Exchange is in a state of confusion now, and this would help.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. There has been some considerable misunderstanding and no little criticism in regard to a ruling of the comptroller with regard to that provision of the bill which provides, if I recall the provision correctly, that national banks can loan 50 per cent of their capital and surplus on farm mortgages, or one-third of their time deposits.

Mr. GLASS. Twenty-five per cent of their capital and surplus, or one-half of their time deposits.

Mr. GOOD. As I understand, the Comptroller of the Currency has ruled that where a national bank has a capital and surplus, say, of $50,000, they could loan then to the extent of $12,500. Is that correct?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. And if that bank had time deposits of $400,000, the comptroller has ruled it can not loan on farm mortgages to exceed $12,500, thus practically nullifying that provision of the law with regard to time deposits. I would like to ask the gentleman if there would be any objection, now that it is proposed to amend the act, to amending by inserting some provision to make clear the intention of Congress that national banks could loan on real estate to the extent of one-third of their time deposits?

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, I do not think the Comptroller of the Currency is authorized to make any "ruling" upon that question at all. It is a question that the Federal Reserve Board, composed of six other members besides the Comptroller of the Currency, will have to rule upon. I think the law is perfectly clear—as I know the intention of Congress was perfectly clear—to permit banks to loan 50 per cent of their time deposits; but that is not relevant now.

Mr. GOOD. I know it is not relevant to the proposed amendment; but at this time in those sections of the country where national banks located in small towns do want to make loans on farm securities they are not permitted to do so.

Mr. GLASS. I think the law is perfectly clear. At least, it is clear to my mind on that point.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is familiar with the ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency on that point?

Mr. GLASS. I do not think that official is authorized to make a ruling on this point. He may have given an opinion, and if he has given the opinion indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, it is an opinion I do not agree with.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Has the new Federal reserve system fully gone into effect yet?

Mr. GLASS. No; it has not.

Mr. TEMPLE. How can the ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency affect the operation of a law that has not gone into effect?

Mr. GLASS. I have said that I do not think the Comptroller of the Currency is authorized to rule upon a law that has not gone into effect, especially upon a question committed to the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. TEMPLE. When it has gone into effect they will have a Federal Reserve Board and not the comptroller?

Mr. GLASS. I have said so.

Mr. GOOD. As I said to the gentleman, the ruling was made two months ago, at least, and was just as I have indicated. It was sent out as a department circular, signed by John Skelton Williams, comptroller. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 15, 1914.

To the CASHIER.

SIR: You are advised that section 24 of the Federal reserve act provides that—

"Any national-banking association not situated in a central reserve city may make loans secured by improved and unencumbered farm land situated within its Federal reserve district, but no such loan shall be made for a longer time than five years, nor for an amount exceeding 50 per cent of the actual value of the property offered as security. Any such bank may make such loans in an aggregate sum equal to 25 per cent of its capital and surplus or to one-third of its time deposits, and such banks may continue hereafter, as heretofore, to receive time deposits and to pay interest on the same."

National banks may therefore now legally make loans secured by real estate, provided they conform to the requirements of the law, including the following:

1. Real estate security must be farm land.
2. It must be improved.
3. There must be no prior lien.
4. Property must be located in the same Federal reserve district as the bank making the loan.
5. The amount of the loan must not exceed 50 per cent of the actual value of the property upon which it is secured.
6. The loan must not be for a period longer than five years.
7. The total of such loans by any bank must not exceed one-third of its time deposits, and must in no case exceed one-fourth of the capital and surplus of the bank.

In order that the examiner may readily classify real estate loans held by a bank at the date of his examination, a statement signed by the officers making the loan, and having knowledge of the facts upon which it is based, must be attached to each note, certifying in detail, as of the date of the loan, that the requirements of law have been duly observed.

Respectfully,
JNO. SKELTON WILLIAMS,
Comptroller.

Mr. GLASS. It may have been an opinion. It was not a "ruling." In this connection I would like to correct the widespread misconception about the Federal reserve act imposing a limitation upon loans on real estate by State banks and trust companies which may become members of the system. It does nothing of the sort. It simply contains an enabling provision which permits national banks to loan on farm mortgages—something they could not do under the national-bank act. The Federal reserve act does not intefere with the real-estate loans of State banks and trust companies in any particular.

Mr. WINGO. When do you think these Federal reserve banks will go into operation?

Mr. GLASS. I have been told it will be a matter of nearly 90 days.

Mr. WINGO. It will be 90 days before these banks will be established and get to doing business?

Mr. GLASS. I have had that opinion from one member of the Federal Reserve Board. On the contrary, the Secretary of the Treasury told me yesterday they were going into the oganization of the system right away.

Mr. WINGO. But to get into perfect working order it is your judgment it will take about 90 days, is it?

Mr. GLASS. To get the entire system into perfect working order; but it may be possible, Mr. Speaker, to organize the banks in the three central reserve cities right away, in order to take care of the exportation of cotton, grain, and other products.

Mr. WINGO. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to suggest this: That I think the question of marketing the cotton crop and getting it to Europe and the exchanges are not the only problems. I think it is not so much a question of what you are going to do with the cotton crop as what you are going to do for the man who has produced it and has not any market for it now. It is very evident that you are not going to have any very great amount of cotton to export before these banks get into operation, some 30, 60, or 90 days from now. And there are some other amendments that the cotton producers think are very necessary to that act to meet the real emergency, and for that reason I think we ought not to take but one bite at the cherry. I think the committee ought to be gotten together, as it is easily done. The gentleman states that an effort to get them together heretofore has failed. I will state that I have been present every time it has been called. The last time I was the only man present.

Mr. GLASS. I made no criticism of anybody. I simply stated the fact that two attempts by me to get a meeting proved unavailing.

Mr. WINGO. The proposal involves the foreign exchanges of the country, and it authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to take the limit off. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, as we can not get the banks in operation for some time, I object. Let the gentleman get the committee together and consider this as well as other proposed amendments that are of more vital importance. The committee has a right to consider it, and the House is entitled to the judgment of the committee as a committee, and not merely the judgment of a few members consulted in private.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] objects.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the ruling of the comptroller that I have referred to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the ruling of the comptroller. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, August 17, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 234) directing the selection of a site for the erection of a statue in Washington, D. C., to the memory of the late Maj. Gen. George Gordon Meade, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1089), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Petition of the Tobacco Association of Southern California, against increased taxes on manufactured cigars; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 11, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the pending conference report be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on House bill 18202.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fall	Overman	Stone
Bryan	Gallinger	Penrose	Swanson
Burleigh	Hitchcock	Perkins	Thomas
Burton	James	Pomerene	Thornton

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. This announcement will stand for the day.

I will also state that the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CLAPP, Mr. COLT, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. LANE, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. WHITE answered to their names when called.

Mr. OWEN, Mr. BRADY, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. LEE of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments. I rise to make a brief statement upon the pending bill, and I would ask permission to have the Secretary read three telegrams, which are merely a sample of thousands which I have been receiving in the last two weeks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEWPORT NEWS, VA., August 15, 1914.

Senator BOIES PENROSE,
Washington, D. C.:

Many thousands of people on the Virginia Peninsula will be rendered practically homeless by the passage of the amendment admitting foreign-built ships to our coastwise trade. Eighteen millions of dollars invested in the shipbuilding industry here, besides property now worth perhaps twice that sum and dependent for value upon that industry, will be wiped out of existence. I most respectfully but urgently protest against the passage of the amendment which will accomplish this result.

B B. SEMMES, Mayor.

WARREN, PA., August 16, 1914.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I beg to call your attention to the new shipping bill admitting foreign-built vessels in coastwise trade of this country. Such action would be a disastrous blow to American built vessels. As I and a number of friends are largely interested in American-built vessels, I trust you can see your way clear to oppose admission of foreign-built vessels to coastwise trade.

JERRY CRARY.

WARREN, PA., August 16, 1914.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Many of our friends here and ourselves are largely interested in American shipping and its future welfare. We vigorously protest against admission to coastwise trade of foreign-built ships, even though flying our flag. Such an act would most seriously jeopardize hundreds of millions of American dollars now invested in our domestic shipping.

F. H. ROCKWELL & CO.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have here a memorial addressed to myself, signed by thousands of the employees of the William Cramp & Sons Ship & Engine Building Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., declaring that they oppose the shipping bill now before Congress, as it would deprive them of their means of livelihood. At the proper time, when petitions are in order, I shall present the memorial and ask to have it lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial is in order now as a part of the discussion of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I will then present it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the world-wide crisis which makes it necessary or desirable to do something for the relief of the conditions of our foreign commerce and enable us to carry American cargoes and American products in American bottoms under the protection of the American flag. But it seems to me that the proposition has been carried to an extreme which is utterly unjustifiable. In fact, it is difficult for me to conceive of legislation carried to such a radical and destructive extreme as seems to be contemplated by the pending bill.

There is no justification for this extreme measure. There is, in my opinion, no necessity for it. It is a sudden and unwarranted reversal of the policy of this country under Democratic administration as well as under Republican administration for a hundred years or more. The shipowners and builders of this country have "made good" under it. It is only American shipping in the foreign trade, which is without encouragement, that has declined.

American shipping in the coastwise trade has grown steadily. In 1883 this shipping amounted to 2,538,000 tons. By 1893 it had increased to 3,854,000 tons. In 1903 it amounted to 5,141,000 tons, and in 1913 to 6,816,000 tons. It is undoubtedly now 7,000,000 tons or more of American shipping engaged exclusively in American commerce. A part of this is on the Great Lakes, but by far the greater part is engaged in trade on the Atlantic Ocean, the Pacific Ocean, and the Gulf of Mexico.

The progress of this American industry, which is suddenly and without warning put in the present bill on a free-trade basis, is one of the most remarkable achievements of the United States. Though for reasons well understood in this body there are very few American ships engaged in trade overseas, the immense size of the coastwise shipping makes the United States the second maritime power in the world, having more tonnage than the German Empire has in both foreign and domestic commerce, and, indeed, more than Germany and France combined.

The building and repair of this great fleet of coastwise ships give constant employment to American labor. The maintenance and operation of the ships furnish employment to many more Americans. Twenty years ago the reports of the Commissioner of Navigation show that not more than 30 per cent of the men employed on American ships were American citizens. But the records of the United States shipping commissioners show that the number of American citizens so employed has been notably increasing of recent years. Thus in the year 1907 there were shipped by these commissioners on vessels of the United States chiefly in the coastwise trade, 69,822 American citizens, of whom 44,085 were natives of this country, and 25,737 were naturalized. In 1913 these commissioners shipped on vessels of the United States 95,820 American citizens, of whom 63,040 were natives of this country and 32,780 were naturalized. American citizens now make up one-half of the crews shipped by the United States commissioners. The bill of the conference committee, allowing the suspension of the law that requires that the officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States, would inevitably lead to the displacing of American seamen by foreigners, for foreign officers would naturally prefer foreign crews, who not only will work for lower wages but will put up with mean living conditions and are less high spirited and more subservient than Americans.

This proposed bill, admitting foreign-built ships to American registry for the coastwise trade is a deadly blow at American labor, and American labor will sharply resent it at the very first opportunity. The emergency that exists can be met by confining foreign-built vessels, as the House bill proposed, to American registry for the foreign trade only. If admitted to the coastwise trade they will seek that trade because they will be safe there from annoyance by belligerent cruisers and safe from exorbitant war insurance rates. The original motive of this proposed legislation will be wholly defeated unless the coastwise amendment is stricken from the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to submit for the RECORD the protest of 2,000 employees at the Fore River Shipbuilding Yards, Quincy, Mass. Necessarily it has been difficult to get all of the interests which are involved in the pending legislation notified of its destructive qualities, but four or five days ago it was brought to the attention of the employees at this yard, and substantially every man has signed this protest, which I send to the desk and should like to have incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. President, this protest expresses the fear which these men have that their employment, which has been of long standing in many cases, is going to be entirely taken from them. The employees of a great shipbuilding company are very largely expert machinists; they are not, to any considerable extent, the common labor which can be employed in any work, but are men who are trained for this particular service. If they lose that employment it will be difficult for them to establish themselves in a similar work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the protest will be printed in the RECORD.

The protest referred to is as follows:

FELLOW EMPLOYEES: The time at our disposal to prevent the passage of the bill which is engaging the attention of the Senate at the present time is very limited, as the vote is taken on Monday which will completely destroy the shipbuilding industry in this country. This bill provides free American registration for ships built in foreign countries, but also includes all our coastwise trade, which, up to the present time, has been rigidly maintained for the exclusive use of American ships built in American shipyards. The effect of the present bill will be to totally destroy our present source of employment, as foreign-built ships would dominate and control the whole situation. Your vote as a protest against the passage of such a bill is urgently required to present to the Senate, thus showing that you realize the effect which it would have on employees not only actually engaged in the construction of ships, but in the manufacture of the products which enter into it.

On behalf of the employees I ask your support in trying to prevent such an outrage on men engaged in our industry.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I also wish to read for the RECORD a protest signed by the secretary of the Carpenters' District Council of Boston. It is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., August 15, 1914.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In behalf of our affiliated locals, numbering at present 32, we wish you to enter protest against the passage of legislation which will permit foreign-built ships or foreign-manned ships registering in American coast trade.

First. It will tend to reduce wages and demoralize the standard of American living.

Second. It will have a disastrous effect on our shipbuilders, their employees and kindred trades.

Yours, truly,
JOSEPH F. TWOMEY,
Secretary Carpenters' District Council.

I wish also to read into the RECORD an editorial taken from this morning's New York American, which is as follows:

AMERICANIZE THE SHIPPING BILL NOW AND AVOID FUTURE DIVISIONS.

The official appeal of tidewater Virginia to Mr. William Randolph Hearst and his newspapers for aid against the un-American shipping bill is a striking illustration of the intensity of the difference and opposition which that measure, as at present constructed, is receiving inside and outside of the Democratic Party.

The two Democratic Senators from Virginia—MARTIN and SWANSON—are opposing the bill vigorously.

It is not yet too late to amend and reshape the present shipping bill to make it more acceptable to the country.

The necessity for a merchant marine is so keen and pressing that many Senators seem willing to vote for any kind of an emergency bill that will meet the present situation, with the probable view that it will be at least the beginning of a merchant marine to meet the present urgent emergency, and can be amended and made American at leisure after it goes into operation.

There are some honest, even if humid and badly mistaken, Senators who take this view.

But, in the name of American common sense, why not take two or three more days now and lop off the unnecessary and un-American features that excite violent and continued opposition and give us from the beginning a more acceptable and serviceable bill that will do unimpeded service during this emergency and require less wrangling over when the European war is ended.

It is plainly and clearly not necessary to surrender everything American and to sacrifice our domestic shipping in order to get the ships to carry our Atlantic commerce and our South American trade.

Since the discussion began it has been made perfectly clear day by day that we can get the ships we need as American-owned ships.

Then why rush ruthlessly to a foreign ownership?

Why injure American commerce? Why seriously damage American shipyards?

Why raise serious questions of international law with other countries unless it was absolutely necessary to do so, unless it was the only way to get what we want?

That is the common-sense question at issue before the Senate.

It will be utterly impossible to maintain in Congress or before the people a merchant marine that is not American. It will be fought from the beginning to the end, and the American, whatever the outcome of Monday's senatorial ballot, will continually advocate the definite Americanizing of our marine, as it has always done.

This continual and inevitable division will do the bill more harm by far than can be done now by taking two days longer to insert the provisions that will provide a permanent American marine and will duly consider the American owners, the American officers, and the American men.

Just a little broad-minded, resolute national spirit now is needed in the eager rush for this commercial opportunity, and we can have a good merchant-marine bill instead of a bad bill.

Hasty legislation is always to be deplored. Let the Senate be deliberate and wise.

Mr. President, there are three or four questions involved in this legislation. The first question is, Is there need for ships in the trans-Atlantic service? Undoubtedly when this legislation was introduced there was pressing need for such ships, because the service of the vessels of all nations involved in the European war was temporarily discontinued. Since that time, however, the German fleet has been practically confined in its operations to the Baltic Sea and the ocean lanes of traffic for other merchant lines than those of Germany and Austria have practically been open.

It was stated yesterday in the New York Sun that substantially all of the English lines were prepared to continue their operations as heretofore, in some cases changing their English destination from Southampton to Liverpool, and that with the exception of the German and Austrian lines all other European lines, including the French, were in active operation.

Insurance rates, which vary from day to day and which represent the opinions of experts on the hazardous character of the business, are gradually, even rapidly, decreasing. The rate now charged bona fide American ships which are owned by American citizens and which were flying the American flag before the war is only about 2 per cent. The rates for "whitewashed" American ships, as indicated by the probable action of the insurance companies, would be substantially the rates charged for other shipping, even that included in the list of countries now at war, other than Germany and Austria. The rate on English ships is from 10 to 15 per cent; and there is a similar rate on French ships. As I have said, these rates are decreasing from day to day.

So our trans-Atlantic service is not entirely discontinued. The only real discontinuance that will affect our traffic is that of the German regular lines—the Hamburg-American Line and the North German Lloyd Line particularly. They are not entirely cargo carriers; they are very largely passenger ships; and therefore their loss is not so effective in preventing our shipping the goods which Europe needs and which we have to sell.

Necessarily European travel is going to fall off, and therefore the same number of steamers will not be required for this service that were required before the war. What we need is cargo carriers. The English Nation largely controls that service, and, as I have said, their ships are now in operation, at what seems a high insurance rate in normal times, but a rate that is decreasing from day to day and which will necessarily decrease as the conditions of the war progress if the English are successful on the seas.

Then we have in our own service six ships in the trans-Atlantic trade—the St. Paul, the St. Louis, the New York, and the Philadelphia, of the American Line, which are subsidized under the mail-subvention act, and the Finland and the Kroonland, of the Red Star Line, which are American built and American officered. Those ships are in actual operation to-day, and are carrying their full capacity of passengers and freight.

We also have the Ward Line between the Atlantic coast and Cuba and Mexico; the Red D Line between New York, Porto Rico, and Venezuela; and in the Pacific five ships of the Pacific Mail Line to the Orient, three ships to Australasia, all subsidized; one ship from Seattle to the Orient; and, in addition to that, between the coasts the American-Hawaiian Line, the line controlled by Luckenbach & Co., the line controlled by W. R. Grace & Co., and the line controlled by John S. Emery & Co., of Boston, these latter all prepared to take advantage of the Panama Canal and conduct a better service between the two coasts.

Mr. President, I am not opposed to the emergency bill as it passed the House, but I do not think it is nearly as necessary as it was when introduced; I think we will find that owing to the decreased volume of passenger traffic and of freight offering between here and Europe our ships and the English ships and the French ships will be able to take care of it fairly well; but if not, there are numerous offerings of our coastwise shipping to-day to go into this service. I was informed this morning by the representative of one company that his company had just offered four ships having an average tonnage of 7,200 tons to the Government, as they did when it looked as if we were likely to have war with Mexico. At that time they offered this tonnage to the Government for three or four months. Why? Because they wanted to do a patriotic service, in the first place, and because their ships were not employed to full capacity, in the second place. There are numerous cases of offering of coastwise vessels; the coastwise trade is dull now, so that we may supplement the English and French and the American service which we now have for the trans-Atlantic trade with many ships which are not now employed in the coastwise trade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state whether any of our coastwise shipping has actually entered the foreign trade since this disturbance began?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I understand that in one day in New York there were 10 applications for transfer from the coastwise to the ocean carrying trade. I have not the figures at hand, but I think that statement is authentic; and I am quite confident that, if insurance rates warrant, there will be ample offerings of shipping for that purpose.

I want to suggest here that the most important thing we could do would be to try to bring down insurance rates to a living figure. That is what England has done with its trade; the English Government has been and is cooperating with English shipping interests in regard to insurance rates, and that would be the most effective step we could take to get our trans-Atlantic traffic carried cheaply and effectively.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that matter is being taken care of, as I understand, by a separate bill. I want to ask the Senator if he can tell the Senate the amount of tonnage now available in our coastwise trade which could be put into the international trade?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I can not do that with accuracy, and I would not want to guess at figures. I have just stated that one company, doing a coal-carrying business, has offered 28,000 tons of shipping for this purpose; and it is reported that the American-Hawaiian Line has offered a considerable part of its shipping for this service. I have no doubt that there is a very large tonnage available, if the insurance rates will warrant its going into the foreign service.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for an interruption?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that the offering of ships of American registry for the foreign trade all depends upon insurance against war risks? There are boats which would enter the foreign trade, but they do not wish to do so until they can obtain reasonable insurance rates; they are asking Congress to pass a bill under which the Government shall guarantee against loss by capture or from floating mines and other losses incident to the war, and until that question is settled we can not know whether or not these ships will enter the foreign trade.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to pursue that inquiry a little further. Is it not expected that the result of the war will really increase the trans-Atlantic trade by reason of the increased demand for our products from Europe?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the first effect has been to decrease trade. Of course, passenger traffic is going very largely to fall off; it has already largely fallen off. As soon as we get our people home, the passenger traffic is going to be greatly reduced from what it is in normal times. Great importations have been coming into this country from Germany, amounting to several hundred millions of dollars a year. Necessarily, that business, if the English Government controls the seas, is going to be wiped off the slate; so that in all probability the volume of trade until the war terminates will be much less than in normal times. Our exports to Germany, for instance, were $232,000,000 last year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But they were all in German boats, were they not?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, not necessarily. It depends on the kind of traffic. It may be in any kind of a cargo carrier—a Norwegian boat, for instance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My information has been that one-fifth of all our trans-Atlantic trade has been in German bottoms heretofore.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think that is correct. I have not the figures at hand, but I think that is distinctly wrong, because the number of German cargo carriers is relatively small, and always has been. If we were to consider alone the kind of traffic that is carried by the mail lines or the passenger lines, like the Hamburg-American and the North German Lloyd, which include passengers, I should say quite likely that statement would be true; but the heavier, bulkier freight—iron products, potash, phosphates, and things of that kind—is carried by tramp steamers and the steamers of any nation; of those, Germany has a relatively small number.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The figures I had in my mind were that the total tonnage last year was 17,000,000 tons, and that of that amount the German vessels carried between three and four million tons.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I understand that a rule was adopted about 20 minutes' time, if other Senators wish to speak. I am quite willing and glad to answer inquiries, but there are a few things which I want to state in my own time; and if I am to be limited to 20 minutes and the inquiries are to be taken out of that time, I shall have to ask that I be not interrupted again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no way to keep the time except by the time a Senator is on the floor, and the Senator's 20 minutes have expired.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it seems to me this is a time when we might find out how many there are who wish to speak, and, if possible, that I might be given additional time.

Mr. POMERENE. My understanding of the rule was that the 20-minute provision applied only after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. STONE. There is to be no debate after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A vote is to be taken at 2 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, unless the time of the Senator from Massachusetts is to be extended, I desire to take the floor now in my own right.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think it is hardly fair, in view of the interruptions to which the Senator has submitted, to count that time against him. I had intended to say something, but I am perfectly willing to waive any right I have in favor of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no earthly way in which the Chair can keep track of interruptions. The Senator who has the floor has the floor.

Mr. STONE. How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to consume a good deal of time, but if I might be given 10 minutes without interruption I will try not to detain the Senate further.

Mr. STONE. There are several Senators, I know, who desire to speak on this matter between now and 2 o'clock.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not wish to take any more time than I am entitled to; but I inadvertently allowed interruptions, not thinking of the 20-minute rule, which was adopted when I was not present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator's time be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be done under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is wholly impossible to change the unanimous-consent agreement unless it is going to be wiped out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, undoubtedly the Senator from Massachusetts can continue under the unanimous-consent agreement unless some other Senator says he desires to speak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. So the Senator can continue unless some Senator interrupts him.

Mr. STONE. Then I shall not insist on the floor until the Senator has occupied his 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts may proceed for 10 minutes, unless some other Senator desires to speak.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, one of the questions which we should consider is this: Is it safe to purchase ships and make transfers as proposed under this bill? I shall not have time to discuss that matter in any great detail. I think if bona fide transfers are made, if the ships are actually paid for, quite likely it will not get us into trouble; but if we permit any paper transfers, the organization of paper corporations to take over the large shipping interest which we know is waiting to be sold to Americans, then we are liable to get ourselves into very serious trouble.

I find a precedent which might apply in such a case. During our Civil War, when Capt. Semmes, in the Alabama, was cruising in eastern waters he fell in with a ship which looked like an American, flying the British flag. It turned out to be a ship called the Martaban, which had been known in the American service as the Texan Star. This ship was in an Indian port and transferred its allegiance to England in some form—due form, as far as the ship's papers were concerned. Capt. Semmes made this report:

> In the Straits of Malacca, at half past 11 a. m., "Sail ho!" was cried from the masthead, and about 1 p. m. we came up with an exceedingly American-looking ship, which, upon being hove to by a gun, hoisted the English colors. Lowering a boat, I sent Master's Mate Fullam, one of the most intelligent of my boarding officers, and who was himself an Englishman—> on board to examine her papers. They were all in due form, were undoubtedly genuine, and had been signed by the proper customhouse officers. The register purported that the stranger was the British ship Martaban, belonging to parties in Maulmain, a rice port in India. Manifest and clearance corresponded with the register, the ship being laden with rice and having cleared for Singapore, of which port she was within a few hours' sail. Thus far, all seemed regular enough, but the ship was American—having been formerly known as the Texan Star—and her transfer to British owners had been made within the last 10 days, after the arrival of the Alabama in these seas had been known at Maulmain.

Capt. Semmes removed the officers, who were Americans, and the crew, who were Americans as well, hauled down the British flag, and destroyed the ship and cargo. There was no question about the cargo having been British. It was shipped in a British port to another British port, and yet he burned the ship and the cargo, and no protest against this action was ever made by the British Government, either at the time or later.

That is an indication of what may happen. What are we going to do if one of these transferred ships, transferred under similar conditions, is carrying a cargo from one American port to another, if you please, and an English man-of-war overhauls her, takes off her crew, and sinks the ship, hauling down the American flag? What position are we going to take? Are we going supinely to do what the English did under those circumstances, knowing that we are in the wrong, or are we going to protect our flag, as we should do, on the high seas? I simply instance that as one of the possibilities that may come out of this legislation; and yet if the bill were before us in its original form I would vote for it notwithstanding that dangerous possibility, because in a case like this I think everything should be done that can be done to protect our interests, and I hope these dangerous conditions would not arise.

Now, the question arises, Is there need for further shipping in our coastwise service? I should like to discuss that subject in great detail, but the evidence is on every hand that the coastwise shipping is largely idle at this time; that there are ships not only on the Pacific coast, but very many of them on the Atlantic coast, which are ready to go into the foreign service if it can be conducted profitably; that there is sufficient tonnage not only to do the coastwise business under present conditions, but to supplement our foreign trade. Under those circumstances, what possible reason can there be for injecting here this proposition, which came as a result of the conference, to open our coastwise trade to foreign shipping without limit for the next two years?

That has been tried several times before. You will recall that during the consideration of the Panama Canal bill in 1912 that proposition came up, and was promptly voted down by the Senate. I do not remember whether it appeared in the House or not. Only six weeks or two months ago we had a similar proposition before the Senate, during the consideration of the canal-tolls bill. The amendment of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was pending, as amended by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. It opened our coastwise trade to foreign ships. The vote on that amendment, as Senators on the other side will recall—many of whom, I understand, are going to vote for this proposition, though they voted against that one—was only 12 in favor, 67 against, and 16 absent.

There never has been an expression of opinion, either in the Senate or in the House or in the country, when there was any demand to open our coastwise trade to the ships of foreign nations. We will not only destroy a great interest, in my judgment, but we will do more than that, because the protection of shipping is not like the protection of any other industry. The protection of a manufacturing industry may affect that industry alone. The destruction of the shipping industry not only destroys that industry, but it also prevents the developing men for our naval service and ships for our naval service, and in many other respects demoralizes a service which is of great national value to us.

It is said that there are not sufficient officers to command and to serve on board the ships that may come here. Possibly that may be found to be true; and yet I should like to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the State of Massachusetts has been maintaining a school ship for a great many years, spending something like $60,000 a year for that purpose. The ship has been furnished by the Government, and there have been turned out every year 40 or 50 American boys competent to serve in any capacity on board any ship, either in a minor or in a primary capacity. There are a large number of men serving in our coastwise fleet as officers in junior capacities who have passed or are competent to pass examinations of the first class—that is, the navigation examination, the seamanship examination, and other examinations which would entitle them to the command of a ship in the deep-sea service. It is not necessary, in my judgment, to admit the possibility that we must go abroad to obtain officers or men for our service. It would be a serious handicap to the development which has been going on for years in Massachusetts and New York and Pennsylvania in the way of educating these young men for this service, if at this time, instead of promoting these young fellows who are entitled to promotion, we should say to them: "You are not fit, so we will take foreign officers for this service."

Mr. President, just one word about the taking over of foreign shipping for this service and what is being done to prevent it. I noticed in the New York World yesterday an editorial attacking the American shipping interests for appearing in Washington at this time to protest against this legislation. Why should not they appear? They are representing an industry that employs $100,000,000 or more of capital, that employs 50,000 men in addition to the people employed in developing the material that goes into the ships, that employs in the shipping interest itself large numbers of American citizens. Why should not they be here? And why should they be criticized any more than any other citizens for coming here to point out to Congress that this legislation is going to be damaging to their interests?

Does anybody criticize the cotton growers of the South for coming here and trying to point out how their interests can be promoted? Does anybody criticize any other similar interest for doing the same thing? Not at all. We take that as a matter of course, for it is their right and their duty to do so.

This talk about a "trust" in the shipping business is without any foundation. We have seven or eight great shipyards in this country. The time has never been, when the United States has asked for bids for the building of a battleship or any other craft for the service, when there has not been active competition among those yards. The same is true as to ships for other service. It is not a profitable industry, even under the present conditions. The great yard in Massachusetts, the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., which employs in normal times 3,000 men, has been reorganized three times during the last 20 years. The Cramp company, which is familiar to you all, has been reorganized. There is not any evidence anywhere, and there never has been a word of evidence taken, that there is any combination among these shipbuilding interests or that the industry is profitable, even to the extent of a reasonable return on the amount of capital invested.

This other claim of a combination which controls our coastwise trade is equally without foundation. It is true that certain steamship lines do conduct a service, carrying passengers between certain ports on the Atlantic coast, and they do control that kind of carrying capacity; but that is only a small part of the coastwise trade of this country. I can say to Senators, also that there is not a single one of those companies in the case of which, if anyone wants to invest money, he can not buy the stock at less than their replacement value, and in some of them, to my knowledge, it can be bought for less than 50 per cent of its replacement value.

All of this talk about trusts controlling the shipbuilding industry of this country or controlling the coastwise shipping is so entirely without foundation that it ought not to be credited by any Senator for one moment.

I see that I have used the 10 minutes that were kindly allotted to me, and I am not going to trespass on the time of others. If time develops before 2 o'clock, I should like to continue the remarks which I intended to make.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, within the 20 minutes at my disposal I can not discuss our entire code of navigation laws, not even that part relating to coastwise shipping, nor have I time to inquire into the extent of American tonnage and shipping facilities. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] seems to think there is a sufficient supply of ships now having American registry to answer the emergency immediately upon us. I do not agree with him, but, on the contrary, I am satisfied that we can not depend upon American ships now registered under our laws to meet more than a small fraction of the demand the country is making for facilities for transportation to foreign ports of the products of our fields and factories. I can not, within the limits of my time, take that matter up in detail. I assume and assert that we are very short of ships for the service I indicate. If we are not short of ships then this legislation is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. President, I wish here to say that I seriously doubt whether it is wise or advisable to enter upon the work of revising our navigation laws to any extent not absolutely necessary when we are now supposed to be engaged upon the work of enacting legislation to meet a pressing emergency. At the proper time, and when we can have before us a measure covering our entire system of navigation laws, and when we will have time to give to that subject the consideration its importance deserves, I shall be glad to take it up. Primarily, I do not hesitate to say that I favor admitting all ships of American registry into both the coastwise and over-seas traffic; but I seriously doubt the wisdom of undertaking at this time and in connection with this emergency legislation to revise this long-established system of laws—a system involving a national policy, I think a mistaken policy, but one which has been in force for many years, and undertake to discuss and dispose of such a question with only a few hours of hasty and imperfect consideration. I look forward with the hope that in the almost immediate future Congress will take up the question of enacting legislation in a large way with a view to rehabilitating our merchant marine. I am anxious to do that and will be glad to discuss the various aspects of that legislation when the occasion arises.

But, Mr. President, at this time the only paramount object I have in mind, and which I suppose this Congress had in mind when this legislation was initiated, is to procure and supply adequate facilities, immediately available, for transporting our products to foreign markets, and thus ameliorate, if not terminate, the congested condition now prevailing. I am not seeking at this time to provide additional ships for service in the coastwise trade, but to provide additional ships for use in the over-seas traffic. I want to reach the outside markets of the world. I think the conference bill now before us will have little, if any, effect beyond putting a number of foreign ships into the coastwise business without adding anything of consequence to the carrying facilities for our products going abroad. I am not sensitive about the effect of this legislation on the coastwise shipping interests. The coastwise shipping is a legalized monopoly, and I have no sympathy with it; but if we shall permit ships purchased under this act to go into the coastwise business, they will not go into foreign business. Why should they? There are numerous foreign-owned ships now idle in our ports unable to escape from them. If they leave the shelter of our ports, they are almost certain to be captured and confiscated. We are told that many of these ships are for sale to Americans at a low price, but Americans will not, in my opinion, purchase them for use in carrying our products abroad. The purchasers could not get anything like adequate insurance on ships or cargoes without paying rates so high as to make them prohibitory. I do not believe they will pay such rates of insurance and at the same time take the risk of having the ships captured and dragged into prize courts, where they may be condemned and confiscated. I went over all this the other day, and it is hardly necessary to advert to it more at length at this time. I do not believe that Americans will invest large sums in foreign ships under the provisions of this bill or under the provisions of any bill like this, for use solely in trans-oceanic trade, especially in trade going to any of the belligerent countries. But if you open our coastwise shipping to these foreign-owned ships, Americans will be tempted to purchase them at low rates and turn them into the coastwise business until the European war is closed; but, as I have said, that is not what we want.

The moment you open a coastwise business to ships purchased under this so-called emergency legislation you make it practically certain that the ships will not be used for the purpose which I have supposed was moving us to enact this emergency legislation. We erect an obstacle that will stand in the way of accomplishing the very thing we had in view when we initiated this legislation. What I am after now is to get ships for the over-seas traffic and not for the coastwise traffic. At this moment we are not looking for relief, so far as the coastwise business is concerned—we now have adequate facilities for that—but we want ships to take our products to the outside ports of the world. I think this bill would be an utter failure; it would hold out the word of promise and break it to the hope. As much as I favor putting all American registered vessels into the coastwise trade, if they elect to enter it, I think if we opened that trade to these newly purchased ships at this time we would defeat the very thing we are primarily attempting to accomplish. This proposition ought not to have been attached to this legislation, and the bill ought not to pass with it if we expect to get any benefit from it.

Personally I do not believe there is anything of value in this bill now before us, for the reason that Americans are not going to buy these ships and take the risk of operating them on the high seas unless the Government itself shall become the insurer and issue war risks covering both ships and cargoes; and I think it more than probable that we will have to do that before we can secure anything approaching adequate relief for our farmers and manufacturers. For myself, as I have said more than once, I believe the Government itself should buy the ships and furnish the relief so grievously needed, instead of leaving all this to private enterprise. In this emergency I am in favor of legislation for buying Government ships far more than for legislation authorizing private citizens to purchase them. There can be no doubt of the right of the Government to buy ships upon its own account; and if they do buy commercial ships they can be used in any way the Government pleases to use them. Only the other day we passed a bill authorizing the use of warships for carrying mails, passengers, and freight to the ports of South America. If we can use our warships for such purposes, we could certainly use our commercial ships for such purposes. The one really sensible thing for us to do would be for the Government to buy ships, and when the war storm raging in Europe is ended and normal conditions restored, the ships so purchased could be and should be transferred to the Navy Establishment as an auxiliary. I would not want to sell the ships we might buy, for that would entail a great sacrifice and loss. They ought not to be sold, even though no heavy loss should be incurred, but they ought to be attached to the Navy for its uses at all times and for the use of the Government in any period of emergency.

Mr. President, we are told that if the Government should purchase ships and carry cargoes on its own account, it would prevent the organization of a merchant marine owned and operated by private citizens or corporations. This statement is based on the idea that private enterprise would not compete with the Government. Why, Mr. President, no advocate of the policy of Government purchase ever favored for a moment the notion of the Government continuing in the commercial business of transportation in competition with private enterprise. As soon as the emergency confronting us is ended, the ships bought by the Government would be retired from commercial uses and devoted to naval purposes alone. There is nothing to that argument.

It is also said that if the Government itself undertook to operate vessels of its own in transporting cargoes to foreign ports, especially ports of belligerent countries, we would run the hazard of becoming embroiled with some of the countries engaged in war. I do not see why that should be so. I assume that the officials in charge and direction of the business would not be idiots; that they would not attempt to run blockades or carry contraband in their ships. Articles in ordinary use among civilized peoples, such as clothing and foodstuffs, are at most only conditional contraband. What do I mean by "conditional contraband"? I mean that if any attempt should be made to take such articles to a beleaguered fortress, or into an actually blockaded port, or to the armed forces of a belligerent on either land or sea, that would make them contraband; but ordinarily such articles are not contraband under international law. If the Government insures a ship and it is taken and dragged into a prize court, the Government, in fact, would be the real party interested in the case. I assume that the Government would not buy a foreign-owned ship if the foreign Government, whose people own it, had some claim upon the ship, at least that we would not buy it without the consent of that Government. But if the Government whose subjects own a ship is willing for the owners to sell it, no other nation has any right to object. As I have said, I assume that the Government officials operating or directing the operation of Government ships carrying American cargoes would be governed by the rules of prudence and common sense, as well as by the canons of international law. I do not think there is anything to the argument made on this ground against the purchase of ships by the Government.

Mr. President, my time, I see, is about up. I want to see something done in a sensible, practical way—something that will accomplish substantial results in the way of relieving the burdens this great war has cast upon our people. We did not start out to get ships for the coastwise trade, but to get ships to carry our products to Europe, to South America, and to the Orient. We do not now have bottoms sufficient to transport our products to these foreign markets, and because of that we are not only suffering at home but we are losing a great opportunity to develop and extend our commerce throughout the world, and especially on this hemisphere.

I am troubled about this bill, or, rather, as to what I should do with respect to it. I am so anxious to relieve the pressure upon us and afford an outlet for our products to the markets of the world that I hesitate to vote against or to delay the passage of any measure that promises relief; but I can not escape the conviction that this bill in its present form will accomplish practically nothing on the line upon which we should accomplish much.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Senate will not adopt this conference report. To my mind there are two very good reasons why it should not be adopted. I will take the lesser one first, because it is purely a matter of money; it is purely a matter of the welfare of a certain line of business or lines of business in this country, whereas to my mind the other reason is a question largely of national honor.

Since this bill came from the House there has been injected into it, and particularly in the report of the committee of conference, a provision that to my mind may be destructive of a great business. So far as it goes it would be as destructive of one great business as if we had gone immediately without any step to absolute free trade in this country, and thereby destroyed necessarily many lines of business which had been hothoused to the point at which they then stood.

I do not care anything about the coastwise commerce of the country except as it benefits my fellow citizens. I do believe that that coastwise commerce is a great nursery of seamen. It is a great teacher of seamanship; and we see in the present condition of the world how absolutely necessary it is that a great nation shall have some power upon the sea, the greater the better.

The shipbuilders of this country have been greatly hampered in the past, Mr. President, by provisions which had no relation in themselves to shipping. I have tried to avoid any question of partisanship in regard to this bill or a reform of our shipping laws. I stated the other day when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was speaking that I might interject a great deal of partisanship into it; that coastwise shipping has been hampered in the cost of ships built by the high cost of the material that goes into them; that the high cost of the material which goes into them has been kept up to its prices largely by the necessities of the railroad combinations protecting themselves against a tidewater line from Pittsburgh to the coast, when we could have had all structural steel and shapes going into ships, where we could have built them, with the exception of a small percentage, with the labor in this country just as cheaply as they could be built on the Clyde. But though I believe that to be absolutely true, I do not believe in striking down at this time without any sufficient hearing a great industry that is for the great advantage of this country.

I proposed an act before this bill came from the House allowing foreign-built ships bona fide owned by American citizens to engage in voyages a part of which was through the Panama Canal. My idea of doing that was to confine the coastwise trade absolutely within the limits which now exist until we could in some sensible way, in some judicious way, get proper changes in our shipping and commerce laws which would enable our people properly to go forward in this great industry. I believe in that provision now, and were this agreement by the conference committee changed very slightly it would meet my views. Simply for the purpose of enabling Senators to consider it, I would suggest that any provision such as that which has been proposed by the conference committee, if amended as follows, would probably meet the views of a majority of the Senators here, as I am informed the way their views now are. If, in line 23, on page 3, of the conference committee bill, you should insert after the word "if" and before the word "registered" the words, "the voyage in which they are engaged is in part through the Panama Canal, provided they are," I think it would precisely meet my view and the view of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], whose amendment was adopted by the Senate. In order that the Senate may understand what result this suggestion would produce, I will read the clause as it would then stand. Beginning on line 22, on page 3, of the conference bill, the language would read, if amended as I propose:

> Foreign-built ships may engage in the coastwise trade if the voyage in which they are engaged is in part through the Panama Canal, provided they are registered pursuant to the provisions of this act within two years from its passage.

In that way, Mr. President, I would provide that until we may have a sensible revision of our shipping laws—and I think they need a sensible revision—the coastwise traffic shall be confined as it is and protected as it is by the provision that foreign-built ships may not engage in it. I would prevent by such a provision as that its extension to the interocean trade, because I do not think that is necessary. In their essence voyages from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast are deep-sea voyages; but, to my mind, to inject into this bill such a provision as is proposed by the conference committee would simply work vast hardship and might destroy the only shipping on which we could depend, and might practically destroy American seamanship. Therefore I am unalterably opposed to the provision as it exists in the bill.

The other provision which I have endeavored to have placed in this bill, Mr. President, and which I think should be in it, is one which would throw such safeguards around the acquisition of foreign shipping in this time of war that we would not be unnecessarily embroiled in the raging world-wide conflict. No one can tell what small match will start a great conflagration. I do not believe that this country will be drawn into this foreign war; God grant that it may not; but I can see elements in this bill which may greatly tend to give some foreign monarch or potentate an excuse for dragging us in and possibly then to plead that he must make peace with others because of the overwhelming forces that may be against him.

Mr. President, before this bill came here from the other House, before I knew what its provisions were or what would be presented to us, I had introduced a bill, entirely of my own motion, to which I would ask the attention of those Senators who may be interested in this subject when we come to consider this matter in a broad fashion, and I do not believe, as it now stands, that we can consider this bill in a broad fashion, so far as our coastwise shipping is concerned. We have no safeguards, in my opinion, provided in this bill against embroiling us with foreign nations which are at war. I would provide in this bill, Mr. President, that no ships should be admitted to American registry unless they were owned by Americans. The case referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] this morning shows how easy it would be to get up a great excitement over the seizure and condemnation in a prize court of American ships or ships flying the American flag. I would provide absolutely, as far as I could, that every interest in a ship flying the American flag and purchased during this time of war should be owned by American citizens, and that the ship should be commanded by an American officer.

The provision suggested by me in the bill I drew, which was accepted by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, has been stricken out in this bill, although accepted in the first place. That would have been a great safeguard and security. There is now no provision in the bill which requires that there shall be more than a very few dollars—and they may be fictitious dollars—invested by Americans in ships flying the American flag. The cost of a charter, the cost of a few shares of stock, if those shares are honestly issued for the directors of the company, a board composed for the purpose of making it nominally an American corporation owning these boats, will be entirely sufficient to protect the ship of any foreign nation at war unless such ship is liable to seizure or condemnation in the prize court. I would, Mr. President, in every way avoid embroiling ourselves in such a way as that.

I can not give my consent to any bill passing this body that does not involve actual American ownership. We can get plenty of ships, I think; we can get them for our citizens; we can buy those ships. The freight in a short time will pay back all the money required to do so in this time of war; but not one ship with fictitious ownership, belonging to foreigners, would I have in this time of war justly condemned in a prize court anywhere. We can not be too careful in providing that with respect to the warring nations of Europe we are absolutely straight and honorable in all our dealings. For myself, I do not believe that loaning the American flag for temporary purposes to owners of ships flying the flags of nations which are engaged in war, as this bill might do, is honest treatment of warring nations. I do not want that done. I want to keep this country out of entangling alliances abroad in this time of almost universal war. The provisions of the bill as I have offered to amend them would, I think, protect this country in all respects; but I am willing now to vote for any bill which, in my judgment, does not tend to drag this country into this world-wide strife. I am willing to do anything to advance the American merchant marine, not, however, at the expense of war or of the dangers of war.

Our position in this world to-day is a grand one. We are friends of all, and hoping to remain so, and while we occupy that position we can be the friends of all humanity; but let us for the sake of paltry dollars, let us for any selfish reason give just cause to the nations of this world to let them embroil us in war, our usefulness as a great popular governed nation of the world, hating war and seeking to avoid it in every way, will be destroyed. For that reason, Mr. President, I sincerely hope that when this bill passes the Senate, and when it finally passes Congress, there will be no element in it which will tend to drag us for paltry dollars into the pending world-wide strife.

I shall certainly vote against any bill or any provision in the bill which does not always keep us as far as we can be kept from any possibility of this world war which is now raging. So far as the present effort is concerned, well-meaning, well-intentioned, intending again to bring the American flag upon every sea of the world, of course, I want to see it successful; but I do not want to see it succeed at the possible expense of American honor or at the possible expense of involving our country in a war.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, it would without doubt be much more profitable to leave the discussion of this matter to those who are more familiar with the past history of the legislation and of the actual operation of our shipping laws, but I can not refrain from giving one or two reasons at least why I am unable to support the conference report.

I was not in the beginning so thoroughly impressed as were many other Senators with the idea that there was an emergency which required the immediate enactment of this legislation. At the same time, I was not unwilling that any legislation should be passed designed to meet even an apparent emergency, and therefore I refrained from voting against the bill upon its former consideration by the Senate. I think that the developments of the last three or four days have shown that the emergency is not nearly so acute as we have been taught to believe. I read that nine great trans-Atlantic steamships cleared from New York on Saturday and a smaller number from Norfolk and from other ports. We are told that the British Government has sent out word that the commercial lanes upon the ocean are open, and from other sources we find that the North Sea travel to the Scandinavian peninsula is open; so that I really have no great fear that the world's commerce will not be carried on notwithstanding the war.

Mr. President, the bill as it comes back from the conference committee is a far different proposition than when it left the Senate; indeed, I have very grave doubt whether, under the rules of this body, the conferees were authorized to bring in the report which we are called upon to approve or disapprove. The bill which was passed by the Senate provided that in order to meet the emergency vessels might be purchased abroad, might be registered in the foreign commerce of the United States, and might be officered by men not citizens of the United States. The bill as it comes from the conference committee provides that, but it also provides that such vessels, having been registered under the navigation laws of the United States for the foreign trade, may also enter into our coastwise commerce.

Mr. President, I think there is no one who has not been filled with sorrow when he contemplates the history of our merchant marine and realizes that although we once carried 80 per cent of our own commerce upon the high seas, American shipping in over-seas commerce has so far dwindled that we now carry barely 8 per cent. Through all these years attempts have been made and various devices have been proposed in the way of legislation to remedy that situation, but the American Congress thus far has not risen to the occasion. We have not given our shipping upon the high seas the same advantages which other nations have given their shipping, and, as a natural consequence, the foreign-owned and foreign-manned ships have taken the commerce of the high seas. But we have during a hundred years built up a splendid coastwise trade—as we heard this morning, a coastwise trade equal in tonnage to more than the entire domestic and foreign commerce of Germany.

This conference report proposes what? It proposes not only to let foreign registered vessels enter our coastwise trade. It not only proposes to give them equal advantages with the American owner, but it proposes to give them a great advantage over the American owner. I can not understand, Mr. President, upon what theory this clause in the conference report was written. For the government of our coastwise trade we have built up a set of laws and regulations in regard to the character of the vessel, in regard to the character of the service, in regard to the treatment which the sailor shall receive, in regard to living conditions, in regard to sanitation, in regard to air space, none of which a foreign vessel will be required to observe under this bill.

Why, Mr. President, I think in our merchant marine we have a greater percentage of native-born Americans than in any other great business in this country; but this bill now throws our merchant marine open to vessels officered and manned by foreigners. An American vessel with a foreign crew and foreign officers can not now enter into our coastwise trade, but under this bill a foreign vessel when admitted to American registry may do so. An American vessel can only operate in our coastwise trade by observing the laws of sanitation and good living which are commensurate with the welfare of American citizens, but a foreign vessel operating in that trade under this bill may throw aside all laws of sanitation, may throw aside all laws of right living, and may enter into this great business and ply between our ports with none of the restrictions which we place upon our own vessels or upon our own owners for the benefit of our own sailors. Why is it that in this bill, which is intended to meet an emergency in connection with the over-seas trade, we seek to break up a system of law that has made our coastwise trade the pride of us all? Why is it that we are to break up a system of laws that has been a hundred years in the making?

Nobody knows better than do the Senators upon the conference committee that if this question were here as a naked proposition, dissociated from the present emergency legislation, it would be argued and discussed for weeks and weeks in order to arrive at a just conclusion; and yet the conference committee brings it here before us in a conference report where we are obliged to reject the whole report without amendment or consent to the wrecking of the coastwise trade. Mr. President, whether or not foreign vessels should enter into the coastwise trade is a question that may well be the subject of debate, but the proposal that the foreign vessel shall come into the coastwise trade at a distinct advantage over the American vessel ought not to be the subject of debate for one moment in any American Congress. I am opposed to that portion at least of the conference report, and shall vote accordingly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to refer to the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and afterwards eliminated from the conference report, particularly in view of the able argument just made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] as to the possibility of involving this country in a difficulty with the belligerent powers, although we are dealing exclusively in this particular matter with the coastwise trade.

It is rather an extraordinary situation, Mr. President, that in dealing with our coastwise trade, which is just as much under our jurisdiction and subject to our discretion and control as a railroad, we should be charged with the possibility of disturbing our relations with foreign Governments. We will have to do something very extraordinary in order to give ground for criticism. In my opinion it is not foreign influence so much as local influence which we are likely to offend.

One of the reasons for this amendment was, it is said, that if a majority of the stock of a foreign-built vessel were owned by American citizens the good faith of the transaction could not be impeached, and that should such ships be brought into a prize court our integrity of purpose could not be impugned.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Pedro, in One hundred and seventy-fifth United States, at page 354. Knowing his great ability as a lawyer, I ask particularly the attention of the Senator from Delaware to this decision, because I think it throws some light upon this proposition. This was a case founded upon a state of facts which I can, perhaps, best give to the Senate from the opinion itself:

> In due course, proofs, in preparatorio, which embraced the ship's papers and depositions of her master and first officer, were taken. The master appeared in behalf of the owners and made claim to the vessel, and moved the court for leave to take further proofs, presenting with the motion his test affidavit. In the affidavit it was alleged that, although a majority of the stock of La Compania La Flecha was registered in the names of Spanish subjects and only a minority of the names of British subjects (members of the firm of G. H. Fletcher & Co.), one of the latter had possession of all the certificates of stock, which under the charter of the company established the ownership thereof, whereby he was the "sole beneficial owner of the said steamer Pedro." And further that the steamer was transferred from the British to the Spanish registry solely for commercial reasons, "there being discriminations in favor of vessels carrying the Spanish flag in respect of commerce with the colonies of Spain, in consideration of dues paid by such steamers to the Government of Spain," but that it was the intention of the British stockholders to withdraw her from the Spanish registry and from under the Spanish flag, and restore her to the British registry and the flag of Great Britain whenever the trade might be disturbed. It was also alleged that the steamer was insured "against all perils and adventures, including the risks of war, for her full value by underwriters of Lloyds, London, and by insurance companies organized and existing under and pursuant to the laws of Great Britain, and that if the said vessel should be condemned as prize by this court the loss will rest upon and be borne by the said English underwriters."

Here was an English-built ship, the stock still owned exclusively by Englishmen, underwritten by an English company, which, however, had been transferred to a Spanish corporation, the stock of which was still owned by Englishmen, and was sailing under the Spanish flag. Now, let us see what the court says. I am only going to read a very short paragraph, because I have not time to go into a full discussion of the matter.

> It was argued that the Pedro was not liable to capture and condemnation because British subjects were the legal owners of some and the equitable owners of the rest of the stock of the La Compania La Flecha and because the vessel was insured against risks of war by British underwriters. But the Pedro was owned by a corporation incorporated under the laws of Spain, had a Spanish registry, was sailing under a Spanish flag and a Spanish license, and was officered and manned by Spaniards. Nothing is better settled than that she must under such circumstances be deemed to be a Spanish ship and to be dealt with accordingly.

The court cites in support of its position the case of the Friendschaft, in Fourth Wheaton; the Ariadne, from Second Wheaton; the Cheshire, from Third Wallace; and Hall on International Law, section 169. I have examined these authorities, and they sustain the views expressed by the court. I shall not dwell upon them, however.

Further the court says:

> These stockholders were in no position to deny that when they elected to take the benefit of Spanish navigation laws and the commercial profits to be derived through discriminations thereunder against ships of other nations they also elected to rely on the protection furnished by the Spanish flag. Nor can the alleged intention to restore the Pedro to British registry, if war rendered the change desirable, be regarded. That had not been done when the Pedro was captured.

Mr. President, here was an instance in which there was manifestly a transfer to meet a situation, and the real ownership of all the stock was in the original owners of the boat. It was underwritten by the Lloyds, of London, but the boat was owned by a Spanish corporation, flying the Spanish flag, and under Spanish registry. The court said: We will not inquire further than that fact. That settles the controversy so far as this question is concerned. And there it ended.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SHIVELY. As I understand the case the Senator has been citing and reading from, the court denied the right of the English owners of the stock to raise the question of the good faith of the transaction.

Mr. BORAH. What the court decided was that so long as the ship was under Spanish registry, owned by a Spanish corporation, and flying the Spanish flag it was immaterial who owned the stock. That is what the court decided.

In dealing with our own commerce our transactions can not be material to foreign nations so long as we do not distinctly favor one to the disadvantage of another. So long as we deal by general law and for the purpose of accomplishing general purposes, letting the results reach where they will, to this nation or to that, it can not be said that we are violating in any sense, it seems to me, so far, at least, as it has been pointed out in this debate, any principle or any rule of neutrality. The fact that we are a neutral nation and that we are surrounded by conditions such as confront us because of conditions in Europe does not prevent us from carrying on our commerce and doing business. Whatever is essential to protect our commercial interests and to carry on our business is perfectly proper to be done upon our part, so long as it is not distinctly an act for the benefit of one nation and to the disadvantage of another.

Let me read a short paragraph from the New York Times of August 15, which states this matter, it seems to me, in a concise and conclusive way:

It has been declared by a Federal court that "the neutrality laws are not designed to interfere with commerce, even in contraband of war, but merely to prevent distinctly hostile acts, as against a friendly power, which tend to involve the country in war." Our citizens may freely sell commodities to any or all of the belligerents; they may sell contraband of war, even arms and munitions of war, but contraband, of course, is exported at the buyer's or shipper's risk of seizure. We have a great deal of wheat and other foodstuffs for sale. We are free to sell to England, France, Germany, Russia, or Austria. Our American bankers are also free to negotiate loans for the Governments of the belligerent powers, and our investors are free to subscribe to such a bond issue.

That is another question which is not important now.

Mr. President, this condition of affairs in Europe has also imposed upon us an exigency; and in order to meet that, to find means of transportation, to call to our assistance other ships, to make it easy for foreign ships to assist us in our present situation, we propose to change our laws. They will operate alike as to all powers. They are designed primarily to benefit our commerce, to enable our cotton raisers, our wheat raisers, our manufacturers, and others to reach markets as best they may under the circumstances. What principle of neutrality is violated; what law, possibly, applies to that condition of affairs so long as it is our coastwise business with which we are dealing? True, this morning's paper prints the proposition that it may be considered distasteful or offensive upon the part of England because it might, in her conception, inure to the benefit of Germany, not by reason of the fact that it is a violation of any law of neutrality or any principle of neutrality, but by reason of the fact that the physical conditions are such as may result in advantage to Germany and disadvantage to England. That, however, is no reason why we should not act. We should not hesitate to give our farmers and those who have their cargoes lying upon the docks the means to transport them because, possibly, without any design upon our part, it may work to the advantage of one or the disadvantage of others.

It has been said upon the part of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that there are sufficient ships. I do not know how it is with the part of the country with which he is most familiar. It may be so there; but I do know that there are not sufficient ships upon the Pacific coast to do the business, if responsible men can be relied upon in their solemn statements to their representatives. I have not personal knowledge about the matter, of course; but, as I said the other day, for more than six months, long before this emergency arose or was ever anticipated, I was being appealed to by representatives of business upon the Pacific coast to aid in inviting to our coastwise trade ships that would enable them to transport their cargoes. There could have been no possible reason at that time for misrepresentation; and since this question has arisen, within the last 48 hours, these representations have been repeated to me.

The simple question, then, is in regard to the matter of embroilment with another nation. May we be hindered, stopped, curtailed, circumscribed, and girt in in the discharge of our own domestic duties by reason of the fact that, incidentally, some other nations may be benefited or disadvantaged? I have heard no principle of neutrality announced in this debate, nor have I read of any in any authority upon international law, which would justify such a conclusion.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the merits of this proposition. I did so the other day, and I know there are Senators who have not discussed it who desire to take some time to do so now, and I do not wish to deprive them of the opportunity to speak. I simply wish to call attention, briefly, to some telegrams I have received.

On behalf of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD a telegram from William Livingstone, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, protesting against the adoption of this conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

DETROIT, MICH., August 14, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.:

Our association protests most earnestly against passage of registry bill as reported by conference committee of the Senate and House. To our mind it would be calamity to American shipping interests. Why would it not be much better instead of taking hasty action of this kind, to have joint committee from Senate and House appointed that would be empowered to go into matter thoroughly and investigate all phases; then draw bill?

WILLIAM LIVINGSTONE,
President Lake Carriers' Association.

Mr. JONES. I also present a telegram from Mr. H. F. Alexander, one of our leading shipping men, protesting against the adoption of this conference report. I will say that Mr. Alexander is in favor of the proposition I presented, with reference to the intercoastal trade. I ask that the telegram may go in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

TACOMA, WASH., August 15, 1914.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Opening coastwise trade to foreign vessels will be disastrous to Pacific coast and Alaskan shipping, as first cost of American vessels twice that of foreign, consequently impossible American-built vessels to compete with foreign bottoms. No necessity throwing open coastwise business, as more than sufficient American tonnage now in service or disengaged on this coast.

H. F. ALEXANDER.

Mr. JONES. Then I have telegrams from San Francisco, signed by 15 or more companies and 4 or 5 different individuals, protesting against the adoption of this conference report. I simply ask that the names of the signers of the telegrams may be noted in the RECORD as protesting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

The names referred to are as follows:

Pollard Steamship Co., E. J. Dodge Co., J. R. Hanify Co., Freeman Steamship Co., Sudden & Christenson, Swayne & Hoyt, Wilson Bros. & Co., Hart Wood Lumber Co., Aroline Steamship Co., Leelanaw Steamship Co., Olson & Mahony Steamship Co., Charles R. McCormick & Co., Hicks Hauptman Navigation Co., J. E. Davenport, E. K. Wood Lumber Co., Bowes & Andrew, J. O. Davenport, W. G. Tibbitts, Charles H. Higgins; all of San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. JONES. I also have a telegram from San Francisco, signed by seven different companies, which reads as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 14, 1914.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We commend your efforts on behalf of the bill affecting American shipping. The amendment as proposed by you perfectly met the necessities of the situation. However, the bill as reported by conferees will, if it becomes a law, be of inestimable value to Pacific coast; and, as owners of vessels engaged exclusively in coastwise trade, we much prefer relief afforded by conferees' measure to no relief, and urge your support of same.

This telegram, as I have just read it, of course will be printed in the RECORD. I have quite a number of other telegrams, one signed by 13 different companies, and others signed by 14 different large companies in San Francisco. I ask that the names simply may be noted with the telegram I have read. This is all the time I shall take.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

The names referred to are as follows:

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, in addition to the telegrams sent to the desk by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I desire to present a number of telegrams received by me, and ask that the first five or six may be read. I will say that these telegrams are from the largest shipowners in California and on the Pacific coast, and speak for themselves.

As I said, I ask that the first five or six telegrams may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 15, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

We the undersigned shipowners of Pacific coast most strenuously protest against the coastwise clause in the shipping bill under consideration to admit foreign ships, American registry. There are millions of dollars invested in American shipping on this coast which, if this bill should become a law, would be depreciated 45 per cent. At present there are 50 coasting steamers tied up in this port alone, account business depression.

Pollard Steamship Co., E. J. Dodge Co., J. R. Hanify Co., Freeman Steamship Co., Sudden & Christenson, Swayne & Hoyt, Wilson Bros & Co., Hart Wood & Lumber Co., Aroline Steamship Co., Leelanaw Steamship Co., Olson & Mahony Steamship Co., Chas. R. McCormick & Co., Hicks Hauptman Navigation Co., J. E. Davenport, E. K. Wood Lumber Co., Bowes & Andrew, J. O. Davenport, W. G. Tibbitts, Chas. H. Higgins.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 14, 1914.

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

Respectfully request your assistance in defeating bill allowing foreign-built ships into coasting trade. Our largest steel steamer has been laid up almost continuously since last year, and numerous other coasting vessels have been laid up for months. Seems to us very unjust to change Government's policy at this time when business is depressed and no emergency exists. We see no objection admitting steamers into foreign trade, especially under the emergency, but can see no reason for admitting them into coasting trade.

SWAYNE & HOYT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 14, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The legislation as proposed is unnecessary, also detrimental and destructive to our present coastwise merchant marine. Before enactment of legislation permitting foreign vessels to engage in the coastwise trade we earnestly request that you will obtain for us a hearing before the committee having this matter in hand. Representatives of all interests affected are prepared to come to Washington to appear before the committee as soon as advised by you they will be given such opportunity.

J. C. FORD,
President Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

NEW YORK, August 14, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Coastwise tonnage greatly in excess of demand now lying idle on Atlantic coast and Great Lakes. No emergency demand exists in domestic shipping. Admission of foreign vessels to this trade wholly unwarranted by conditions. Trust you will use your best endeavors to have this provision of pending bill eliminated. If any change to be made, would suggest hearing before action is taken.

AMERICAN TRANSPORTATION CO.,
JAMES W. ELWELL & CO., Managers.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA., August 15, 1914.

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

Many thousands of people on the Virginia peninsula will be rendered practically homeless by the passage of the amendment admitting foreign-built ships to our coastwise trade. Eighteen millions of dollars invested in the shipbuilding industry here, besides property now worth perhaps twice that sum and dependent for value upon that industry, will be wiped out of existence. I most respectfully but urgently protest against the passage of the amendment which will accomplish this result.

B. B. SEMMES, Mayor.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the remaining telegrams may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

OAKLAND, CAL., August 15, 1914.

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We take the liberty of requesting your support against the admittance of foreign vessels to the coastwise trade. We can count from our works alone 30 American vessels that are laid up looking for business, most of them since last year. While we admit that an emergency has arisen in the foreign trade, we see no justice in bringing vessels into our already depressed coast trade.

UNITED ENGINEERING WORKS.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 14, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Foreign vessels are not needed on this coast, as many American vessels are laid up on account of lack of business. This company alone has five out of commission. Hope you can prevent the grave injustice to American coastwise shipping that would result from the admission to the coastwise trade of the more cheaply built and manned foreign vessels.

GEO. H. HIGBEE.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 14, 1914.

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

Many American vessels have been laid up on this coast for some time on account of lack of business, and there is surely no need of increasing this condition by admission of foreign vessels. Same would be a grave injustice to American coastwise shipping interests.

THE SAN FRANCISCO & PORTLAND STEAMSHIP CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 15, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

We heartily favor passage of emergency shipping bill now pending in Senate, as we believe it will afford great and needed relief to producers and shippers on Pacific coast. Lumber, canned and dried fruits, and fish, and all other products of this coast are unable to get cargo space under present conditions. Would have preferred bill giving permission for foreign vessels placed under American register to engage in intercoastal trade only, but interests of whole coast are greater than those of individual shipowners operating locally coastwise.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 15, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

We believe that the emergency shipping bill as reported by the conferees will be a great and needed relief to the producers and shippers of the Pacific coast, and especially to lumber manufacturers, most of whom are unable to get any cargo space for intercoastal shipment under existing shipping facilities, and while we are largely interested in steamers engaged exclusively in coastwise trade, and therefore would have preferred the Jones amendment, nevertheless we feel that the advantages of the bill to the whole community far outweigh any minor individual hardship that might result from its enactment and earnestly urge you to assist in the passage of the bill. We are owners of about 40 steamships in coastwise trade.

WILLIAMS BROS. DOOR & LUMBER CO.

Mr. LIPPITT obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me just one moment to have a telegram read from Oakland, Cal., in connection with the other telegrams?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

The Secretary read as follows:

OAKLAND, CAL., August 15, 1914.

Senator J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We can count from our works about 30 American vessels that are laid up looking for business, most of them since last year, and we see no justice in bringing foreign vessels into our already depressed coast trade.

UNITED ENGINEERING WORKS.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, so far as the legislation which is proposed by this bill refers to the emergency that has been brought about by the war now going on in Europe, I am inclined to favor it. That legislation in effect provides that ships wherever built, whether in the United States or elsewhere, shall be allowed to enter into our foreign trade, and that they may do so regardless of the ownership; except that in case they are not owned by citizens of the United States, they must be owned by a corporation, the only limitation in regard to such corporation being that the president and the managing directors shall be American citizens. With this latter provision I was not in sympathy. Nevertheless, if the conference report had confined itself to that particular legislation, I think I should certainly have voted for it at the time it was presented. I am not so sure that I would vote for it to-day. The longer I think about it the less inclined I am to see the necessity or the wisdom of even that much of legislation in this direction just yet.

The relations of nations at a time like this are matters of great delicacy. We have seen within two days an application made in this country for a loan from France, and it is being discouraged by the President of the United States on the ground that it might affect the sentiment in regard to us entertained in other countries, although similar loans were made to Japan during her war with Russia. In this bill it is provided that foreign ships can fly the American flag, with all that that means, by the simple device of having a few American directors and an American president.

I am reliably told that the owners of the Hamburg-American steamships that are now in this country would, a few days ago, have been very glad to entertain a reasonable offer for their purchase. Under the provisions of this bill they would not have to go so far as to lose their actual ownership. What they could do would be to form an American corporation officered as the bill prescribes, and then these German-owned vessels would be able to carry on their traffic across the ocean as freely as if they were bona fide American. It seems to me that if it was a sentimental consideration which would prevent us from loaning money to France, there is here also a very strong sentimental relationship that should make us hesitate before we put the protection of our flag over a fleet of this kind.

But, Mr. President, whatever I might have felt in regard to that portion of the bill dealing with our foreign shipping, the addition to it which was made in conference, by which foreign-built vessels may engage in the coastwise trade if registered pursuant to the provisions of the act within two years from its passage, is one that I could not vote for under any circumstances. I do not propose at this time to present in detail the reasons for that position because the whole subject has been so thoroughly gone into this morning by the Senators who have heretofore spoken. I merely want to say that to my mind the haste with which this subject has been interjected into this bill, although it bears no relation at all to the emergency which makes the rest of the legislation in the bill perhaps desirable, is of itself a strong objection to such legislation being adopted.

The shipbuilding industry which would be seriously attacked by that provision is one of long standing in this country. The policy in regard to it has been uniform for nearly a hundred years. Under that policy it has grown to an industry employing some 50,000 men, with $125,000,000 capital, with an output of nearly $100,000,000 annually, paying in wages some $40,000,000, and purchasing some $35,000,000 worth of American products in addition. An industry of that importance and built up on a uniform policy of so long duration is entitled to have its situation carefully considered and thoroughly discussed before such a radical attack as this is made upon it.

I do not think it is necessary to settle to-day the question of whether or not there is at the present moment a sufficient supply of ships for the lumber trade of the north Pacific coast. That seems to have been the particular complaint that originated this provision. The people engaged in lumbering in that part of the country feared that when the Panama Canal opened and they were then in a position to ship their merchandise to the Atlantic coast through the canal they would not have sufficient shipping to meet their needs. There have been ample figures presented here this morning to indicate that they are mistaken in that, but whether they are mistaken or not in the actual conditions that might prevail when the canal is first opened, it would in all probability be nothing but a temporary difficulty, for the entire history of the coastwise shipping of this country for years back has been that there have been ample facilities for taking care of whatever was presented.

I know that has been the case on the north Atlantic coast, because I have had repeated and long experience in it. There has scarcely been a month in the last 25 years when, except so far as the trade might have been interrupted by extraordinary weather conditions, there has not been a reasonable amount of shipping to take care of such trade as was offered.

There is, however, one consequence of destroying our shipbuilding industry that has not been referred to, and I think the passage of this provision would mean the destruction to a very large extent of that industry. It can not be presumed that if in the next two years the people wishing to obtain new ships are going to pass by our native shipyards and go abroad to acquire them, that at the end of that period we should then have these shipyards in condition to go on and meet the demand that might exist? Such a provision lasting for that length of time would almost inevitably mean that the very conditions we have produced would necessitate the continuance of it.

What I particularly had in my mind with reference to that is the importance of a country being self-sustaining in its industries so far as possible. That necessity has been one of the arguments by which the protectionists of this country have justified that doctrine. It has not, however, been one that has ordinarily appealed very strongly to the popular feeling on this subject; it is more the argument of the scholar and the economist; but we at the present moment are receiving some very practical illustrations of the soundness of that doctrine.

In the cotton-manufacturing industry at this moment, to which the circumstances of the present war ought to bring perhaps a very extraordinary demand for their products, that industry is held up by the fact that the dyestuffs which they use are almost entirely of German manufacture. The whole value of those dyestuffs as compared with the product of cotton manufacturing is very small; it probably does not exceed in any case 5 per cent of the value of the cloth, and in many cases it does not exceed 1 per cent. Nevertheless, the mere absence in this country of that small detail at the present moment looks as though it might make it impossible for this country to meet the demands that will be created for that product.

In the same way the steel industry is very largely dependent upon ferromanganese. That is largely imported. The war has interrupted the shipping of that very essential article in the manufacture of steel with the result that whereas the ordinary price of ferromanganese is only somewhere from $30 to $40 a ton, last week it was selling at $125 a ton, and sufficient quantities were almost impossible to obtain even at that price, a condition, I understand, that causes much anxiety in the trade.

Even in the much debated industry of sugar raising we are seeing one of the disadvantages of not producing that article for ourselves. A few days ago the price of sugar was 2¾ cents a pound. I am talking of raw sugar. August 14 it sold for 6½ cents a pound so that the people of this country are paying at this moment more than double for sugar simply because we are not producing enough for our own people.

Within the year in consequence of the legislation which has taken place in regard to sugar I am told that there has been a reduction of 133,000 tons in the amount of sugar beets planted, and that this year the crop of cane sugar in Louisiana will likely fall off 92,000 tons.

These instances illustrate results that sometimes happen of depending upon foreign supplies. In the coastwise trade to-day we are not dependent upon foreign sources for our shipping and never have been. As a result of our self-reliance, the war has brought us no crisis in that direction. If a policy for our coastwise shipping such as this bill contemplates had been in force in the past and our source of shipping supply was from foreign countries instead of our own, might we not have been at this very moment bitterly regretting our lack of foresight.

Mr. President, there is one further reason which I want to suggest in opposition to the passage of this act or of any act which allows foreign-built and foreign-owned steamships to enter into our shipping trade. Perhaps some people will say it is a sentimental reason, but I am not ashamed of being influenced by some sentiments. Many times, sailing the waters of my native State and meeting a stately vessel plowing her way to her destination with the American flag trailing over her taffrail or flying in the breeze at her main peak, I have thrilled at the sight. I have been proud not merely of the noble picture such a sight presents, but because the structure over which those colors flew was an American product from keel to truck, because every timber and plank was from an American forest and hewed into shape by American shipwrights; every beam and plate was rolled from American iron in an American mill, and molded into an American design, perhaps from the board of a Herreshoff, a Hollingsworth, or a Cramp. But what American will be proud of a merchant marine whose only American connection will be a dummy president and a dozen dummy directors, sitting for an hour once a quarter in a single room of a New Jersey corporation skyscraper to give a perfunctory approval to the resolutions prepared for them by an English or German advisory committee of the real owners and forwarded from Liverpool or Hamburg? What American heart will thrill at the sight of the American colors on a vessel not one of whose timbers or planks or beams or plates or rivets ever knew the hand of an American shipwright or obeyed the orders of American owners.

If we have indeed become so weak and decadent that we can no longer provide even the ships for our domestic trade and must pass it over to the shipyard and capitalist of Europe, at least let us do it openly. Let us have no pretense or subterfuge about it. If we have to admit those ships, let them come as they ought to come—flying their English or German or Norwegian flag or whatever it may be. But let us keep the Stars and Stripes honest and unstained.

Americans will never be satisfied that the flag of Perry and Farragut, of Santiago and Manila Bay, shall be used as a shameful sham.

What hallucination perverts our reason that we allow the impatient greed of western lumber kings to seize the occasion of a Nation's need to reverse the policy of a hundred years, to shut the gates of our Atlantic shipyards, and compel our shipwrights to leave their useless and empty dinner pails on the kitchen shelves while they tramp the streets in a hopeless search for work? Let this bill go back to the conference committee, and eliminate from it what is not germane to the existing emergency. Take out of it the unnecessary thing that will surely bring idleness to our shipyards and dishonor to our flag, and bring it back as it ought to be, solely designed to meet the real emergency this war has created, and I doubt if a single Republican voice or a single Republican vote will be heard against it. In its present form it is un-American and unjust.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this bill as it was introduced and as it came from the House was to meet an emergency. It has lost all semblance of its original character in the amendments that have been added to it. There has been no emergency in the coastwise trade. There was no necessity for an amendment at this time of our coastwise laws. The American people have been buying coastwise vessels for a good many years in anticipation of the opening of the Panama Canal. My own conviction is that we have all the vessels that we now need to meet the demands of shipment from coast to coast.

We compelled these American purchasers to have their ships erected in American shipyards, to give employment to higher priced American labor, and to pay from 30 to 50 per cent more for their ships than they would have paid had they purchased them from foreign shipbuilders; and now, after more than 100 years of encouragement to the American coastwise trade vessels, and without any indication in any way, shape, or manner that we were inclined to make a change in our coastwise laws, without any indication that we were to turn that trade over to vessels built in foreign countries, we now say to those Americans who have put their money into those vessels that as soon as the Panama Canal is open, for which the very vessels were constructed, we will immediately force you into competition with a class of vessels costing nearly 50 per cent less than those which were purchased by them and for that particular trade.

In other words, we say to the American who has paid $300,000 for a ship built in an American shipyard, "We will put you in competition with a ship that can be purchased in a foreign shipyard for $200,000." Such a competition, Mr. President, is so unjust and the change of our coastwise laws at this time is so unfair to the average American, so unfair to those who have invested in American ships, that I can not understand how anyone who has a just regard for what will constitute fair justice to our own people could now vote to force them in competition with foreign-built ships in this particular trade.

For that reason, Mr. President, I can not vote for the conference report, and I can not believe that there was any occasion whatever for making any change in the original House bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have no desire to express myself at any length at this particular time on this subject. I have before spoken upon the matter, and I feel that the Senate as well as the country know very well my views.

I am utterly and positively opposed to the conference report. I feel that it is utterly and absolutely un-American. I feel that it is prejudicial and detrimental to the interests of my fellow citizens of the State of New Jersey and the country at large. Even from another point, which I do not press particularly, I can not see how under heaven the Democratic portion of the conference committee ever agreed to this so-called conference report.

Some mention was made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] regarding the New York World, where the World said there are some shipbuilding interests here interested in this bill. I ask why in the name of heaven should they not be interested. I have seen men running around here with badges on their left side as long as your arm for a week. I asked them what they were here representing, and they told me they were representing the cotton interests of the South. Why in the name of heaven should not representatives of the shipbuilding interests or the farm interests or any other interest come here and in a legitimate and proper way press their side of the claim? But in this case, in pressing their side of the claim, I claim that they are pressing the American side, and that they are advancing the general well-being of our country.

I have in my hand the New York American of Saturday last. It says in large type—

This un-American merchant marine bill must be made American.

It goes on and speaks of several features of it. It says:

This bill as it stands should be promptly and vigorously defeated in the Senate and made sufficiently American in its provisions before it is accepted.

And if the haste and unintelligent zeal of its advocates should prevail in this emergency to enact it into law, then from the very beginning of its legal life it should be followed and amended and reshaped until it becomes tolerable as an American measure for American ships.

I will not burden the Senate by reading it all; and I respectfully ask that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD at the close of these remarks.

I have in my hand numerous telegrams from gentlemen whom I know, who ask consideration in this matter. I have one here from New York. My colleague [Mr. HUGHES] a day or two ago seemed to scowl at the thought that I was pressing some New York claim. New York is the Empire State of our Union, and New York City is the greatest metropolitan city and the greatest commercial city of the world; it is really the center of the world in commercial supremacy.

I have here telegrams from gentlemen I know—the Babcock-Wilcox Co.—protesting against this law. They say that it can work only detriment to the American people. They say:

We heartily favor the passage of the act so far as it applies to foreign carrying trade, but we utterly protest against the passage of this act as affecting the coastwise and merchant marine.

I have here a score of telegrams—from A. H. Bull & Co. and a number of other companies that have protested. I have one here from Newport News. I certainly think they are entitled to consideration, and they shall have my support and my help in every legitimate proposition that they may press.

But I have a letter here, written crudely, that I will read:

CAMDEN, N. J.

Senator MARTINE: You have grasped the hand of most of us—

And that is pretty nearly true. For 40 years of my life I have been campaigning, and I have wandered through the shipyards and the workshops grasping the hands of those toilers until often my own hand was as black as their shoes—

You have grasped the hand of most of us. We have listened to your speeches. We have believed in you. We believe in you now. Now we ask that you will help us and save our shipping laws from destruction.

GUY SEEL,
A Camden Worker.

AUGUST 10, 1914.

That reflects the sentiment of something like 25,000 men engaged in four or five shipyards of this country, the Cramps, the New York Shipbuilding Co., and others. I will say that 90 per cent of those men are heads of families. Multiply the number by five, and you can see that there are over 100,000 people—men, women, and children—depending upon the success or the failure of our shipbuilding plants; and I plead with all the earnestness and zeal of my nature let not this blot be passed upon our legislation by a Democratic Senate in this crisis.

I want no particular special privilege; but here is a system that for 100 years has been invoked until we have grown beyond parallel, until our coastwise shipping is the admiration of the world. The foreign vessel owners have for years been endeavoring to break in on it in order that they might have the profits.

I will stand with my fellows to do all I can to advance foreign shipping. I want, as you know, a system of shipping owned by the people of the United States to transport our cargoes and our passengers to our ports; but our coastwise shipping to-day exists, and with one fell swoop you would wipe it off the statutes and leave us in the hands of those who for years have conspired against us.

I have here a protest presented by my fellow citizens in Camden and in Gloucester City, N. J., signed by over 2,400 names written by brawny hands, and there is the smell of the oil of the workshop upon it. These are genuine American citizens, interested in the welfare and in the well-being of our country. It is true they work for the New York Shipbuilding Co., but they bring their plant on the banks of the Delaware over at Camden and Gloucester. They fill the coffers and the purses of our workingmen and fill the banks and the treasury not only of Camden and Gloucester, N. J., but of Philadelphia, across in Pennsylvania. These 2,400 names plead for justice, plead for fairness, plead with the American system, of which they have been a part for years and years until we are the glory and admiration of the world. They plead that we stay the hand that would desolate and destroy our merchant marine.

I urge with all the zest and earnestness of my nature, Mr. President, let not the Senate record itself in favor of destruction.

I ask that these telegrams and this editorial and all these names of stalwart men be printed into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, August 14, 1914.

Senator JAMES E. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The A. H. Bull Steamship Co., 90 per cent of whose stock is owned by residents of New Jersey, own eight American steamers, six of which were built in American yards the last four years. The proposed bill to admit foreign steamers to the coastwise trade would depreciate their property at least 40 per cent. Our company has had confidence that some means would be found to extend the American flag to the foreign trade, and were preparing to take advantage of the Alexander bill as passed by the House, but this threatened attack on our coastwise business will make it very difficult for us to secure funds for further expansion, and every American shipowner is in like position. Are those who, against difficulties, have stuck to the American flag now to be penalized for doing so? Is the coastwise trade to be handed over to any alien who will form a dummy company? We hope you will use every effort to have this unjust provision admitting foreign-built vessels to the coastwise trade taken from the bill.

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We believe admitting foreign-built ships to American registry spells death of shipbuilding in this country. As marine engineers, we ask your influence for our industry, which would avoid foreign inroads into this line and result in American merchant marine built by American workmen now idle.

GRISCOM-RUSSELL CO.,
C. A. GRISCOM, President.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA., August 15, 1914.

Senator JAMES E. MARTINE,
Washington, D. C.:

Many thousands of people on the Virginia Peninsula will be rendered practically homeless by the passage of the amendment admitting foreign-built ships to our coastwise trade. Eighteen millions of dollars invested in the shipbuilding industry here, besides property now worth perhaps twice that sum and dependent for value upon that industry, will be wiped out of existence. I most respectfully, but urgently, protest against the passage of the amendment which will accomplish this result.

B. B. SEMMES, Mayor.

SUMMIT, N. J., August 15, 1914.

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Utterly impossible permanently enlist private capital, either here or abroad, in foreign ships under American flag in foreign trade, unless American standards of operating cost be reduced to equal those of foreign competitors. American standards of safety, seaworthiness, sanitation, number of officers, crew, and wages add probably 25 to 30 per cent to operating cost over English, German or Norwegian standards this crew. The only certain way to increase American merchant marine in foreign trade is to have American Government either grant subsidy or add discriminating duty equal to difference in operating cost or purchase auxiliary navy, the vessels of which in time of peace can be used commercially, or amend present navigating laws so as to reduce initial and operating cost and permit foreigners who will accept lesser wages to officer and man ships. By opening coastwise trade to foreign ships the present American shipyards will probably become bankrupt first, and our present magnificent coastwise fleet will soon follow, and we shall then have neither a foreign nor domestic merchant marine on which our Navy can rely in time of war. It will probably do no great harm for Congress to admit foreign ships to American registry for foreign trade, as at present intended, but it will do little good. To open the coastwise trade, which nearly always has had large surplus tonnage, to foreigners and foreign ships will not only fail to increase our foreign trade, but will discriminate against American vested rights and American labor. Within a few weeks, without additional legislation, sufficient foreign and coastwise tonnage should be available for immediate needs. Would therefore respectfully suggest that very deliberate consideration be given to this most important subject before any new laws be enacted. There must be positive assurance that conditions under which ships can be built and operated profitably will be permanent before any intelligant American will invest in shipping.

A. R. NICOL.

[Editorial from the New York American, Saturday, August 15, 1914.]

THIS UN-AMERICAN MERCHANT-MARINE BILL MUST BE MADE AMERICAN.

This country, with all of its vociferous commercial necessities, demands a merchant marine.

The conditions in South American trade and with the temporarily paralyzed trade of Germany cry aloud for ships to meet our unparalleled present opportunities.

But this country demands an American merchant marine. It wishes not merely the American flag on the seas, but American ships on the seas. It wishes the American flag not to protect foreign shipping, but to develop American shipping.

The two Houses of Congress, under the frantic haste of this emergency and evidently without sound consideration, have passed an emergency bill which will create what is beyond all doubt the most absolutely un-American merchant marine that could have been conceived. If England and Germany could have fathered and fostered the bill, it could not have been more foreign or less American.

And the conferees of House and Senate who have it in hand have reported an agreement which actually leaves the un-American feature and leaves the bill an American travesty in shipping policy.

This bill, if agreed to, permits—

(1) The registration as American of any foreign-built hulk regardless of age.

(2) It allows aliens to man and officer this ship.

(3) And it permits this whole brood of foreign ships flying the American flag to do what they have longed to do for years—enter into and take possession of the domestic and coastwise trade.

And the conferees have cut out the only American provision, urged by Senator CUMMINS, which provided that a majority of the owners of these foreign ships should be Americans.

The bill as it stands is a blow to American shipyards and to American shipping.

It is a menace to the peace of nations in the danger of evoking armed protest or capture from German and Austrian and other warships because of its patent evasion of international laws.

When the war is over it opens the way and invites the action of these foreign ships to reenter the foreign service because it is more economical and more desirable to operate under foreign labor and under foreign laws.

It is not necessary, because it is entirely possible to get enough ships for our commercial emergency by public and private purchase under American majority ownership.

It is especially unnecessary and cruel to American domestic shipping in the fact that there is no crisis and no emergency in domestic commerce which justifies this sudden and damaging invasion, destructive to American shipyards and American shipping.

This bill as it stands should be promptly and vigorously defeated in the Senate and made sufficiently American in its provisions before it is accepted.

And if the haste and unintelligent zeal of its advocates should prevail in this emergency to enact it into law, then from the very beginning of its legal life it should be followed and amended and reshaped until it becomes tolerable as an American measure for American ships.

The New York American, which has fought for a genuine American merchant marine longer and harder and more consistently than any other American newspaper has fought for it, pledges its active and unceasing cooperation with every American Senator and every American Congressman who will fight to make this an American measure.

CAMDEN, N. J.

To the honorable Senate and Houses of Representatives:

We, the undersigned employees of New York Shipbuilding Co., earnestly protest against the admission of foreign-built vessels to the coastwise trade of the United States.

We believe the admission of such vessels, built by cheap foreign labor, will ruin the shipyards of this country and deprive us of our means of livelihood.

(Signed by over 2,400 names.)

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] noted the receipt of a good many telegrams he received from the West urging the western delegation to do what they might be able to do to assist in procuring the passage of this bill and the adoption of the conference report. I am not going to read them. I received practically the same telegrams that the Senator from Washington received, and I merely call attention to them.

Mr. President, I hope the conference report may be adopted. I think possibly if a vote had been had last week there would not have been very much question about the adoption of the report, but some of our friends who oppose the conference report have gotten extremely busy since that time, and I am not so sure now that my hopes will be realized in reference to it.

I merely want to call attention to the inconsistency of the position of some of my friends on this side of the Chamber to the difference between the position which is assumed by them now and the position which was assumed by them at the time the bill was passed repealing the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act.

My friend, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], says that he doubts the propriety at this time of undertaking to revise the general coastwise navigation laws in a bill which has for its object the relief of a situation which was created by an emergency. Mr. President, I insist that the enactment of this legislation would not constitute a general revision of the coastwise navigation laws; but referring particularly to the argument which my friend the Senator from Missouri has just made, I want to call attention to what the Senator said in his address when the bill was up to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act, and what he said at that time was in line with the position which was generally taken by those on this side of the Chamber when that exemption clause repeal proposition was up for consideration. On the 5th of May last, in advocating the repeal of the exemption clause, the Senator from Missouri said:

> On the merits of the pending question I can find no satisfactory reason why the American people should grant a subsidy of millions to this special interest, the coastwise merchant fleet, which now enjoys under our laws an absolute monopoly of the enormous traffic carried on along the coasts of all the seas bordering this continent. None but American vessels can enter into this coastwise business; it is a monopoly enjoyed by the American ships engaging in it.

That was the opinion of the Senator at that time, and, possibly, it is his view at this time.

Mr. STONE. It undoubtedly is.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was the view held by many.

Now, Mr. President, when the first proposition is offered to relieve the situation which was complained of by my friends at that time they oppose it; in other words, if foreign registered ships might be admitted to American registry and permitted to engage in the coastwise traffic, there is no shadow of a doubt that the immediate effect would be, if it is going to be as disastrous as they claim, to dissolve the monopoly which exists and which was admitted by all of us at that time to exist on both sides of the continent. The Senator says that it his opinion now, as it was his opinion then. I am sure that if foreign-built vessels could be admitted to the coastwise trade it would at least dissolve the monopoly against which all of us have from time to time complained.

One of the distinguished Senators has said to-day that our merchant marine and the coastwise business has been a magnificent training school for young men who want to follow the sea. Mr. President, I do not know whence that idea comes. We may have a few training schools, but if we refer to the testimony that was taken before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and which was reported to the Senate, we find from the testimony of Mr. Chamberlain, of the Bureau of Navigation, that there were engaged at that time in our over-seas traffic 6 vessels of the American Line, 1 of the Great Northern Line, crossing the Pacific, 3 of the Oceanic—the Spreckels line—crossing the Pacific to Australia, and 5 Pacific Mail ships, crossing the Pacific to Asia and the Philippines. In other words, we have the magnificent fleet of 15 vessels engaged in the over-seas trade, which were and are to be used as training schools for the sailors of this country, for the young men who want to follow the sea. At the same time we had the magnificent fleet of 15 vessels, we find that Great Britain had engaged in the over-seas business something like 4,100 steam vessels. If we could secure a part of them for our over-seas traffic—as I have said before, and I repeat, I do not believe this bill will result in bringing any of them here—but if we can succeed in bringing some of them here and adding them to our fleet as training schools, if for nothing else, we should have done a great good to our country.

On the other hand, speaking of the number of ships that were engaged in the coastwise traffic, I call attention again to the testimony of Mr. Chamberlain when he was before the Interoceanic Canals Committee. The coastwise vessels have been referred to in the discussion here as a magnificent fleet carrying on our American commerce, and we had, according to the testimony of Mr. Chamberlain, at that time about 24,765 vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic. Of the 24,765, only 363 steam vessels were suitable for passing through the Panama Canal, and these were still further reduced by the Panama Canal act of 1912 to about 37, because owned by railroad companies and other combinations. Mr. President, those 37 vessels are the fleet that will be compelled to conduct the coastwise trade, or the intercoastal traffic, if I may so speak of it, and yet some of my friends here have insisted that there are coastwise vessels tied up in all the ports that are unable to find anything to do. I repeat, there are but 37 vessels altogether which are engaged in this business that can pass through the Panama Canal.

If the transoceanic business should prove to be as great as it is hoped that it will be, if it is going to be the profitable business which it is prophesied it will be, then some of these 37 vessels which it is now claimed are in port and unable to find business at all will, in the very nature of things, be invited to engage in the transoceanic commerce and do some of the business that is now being done by the magnificent fleet of 15 vessels which at present are carrying on the transoceanic business. So if there are taken from the few vessels that can now pass through the Panama Canal at least half of them, we will have absolutely no adequate number of vessels with which to carry on our coastwise commerce, and the complaint is general, from my section of the country at least, that there are not vessels to carry the lumber and the fruit and the other products in the Northwest to any market at all.

We are here insisting, Mr. President, that this is not a revision of the navigation laws of this country; that while we are doing something in an emergency to provide for transporting the commerce of this country on this side of the continent to foreign ports, we ought to be willing at least to do something for the western side of the continent that will enable them to get their products to the foreign market; and if not there, at least to our own market on the Atlantic side. We therefore hope that the conference report will be adopted, because we feel it will measurably, at least, assist in relieving a situation which is pressing and which constitutes just as great an emergency on the west coast as exists anywhere on the Atlantic side.

Mr. O'GORMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fall	O'Gorman	Sterling
Borah	Gallinger	Penrose	Stone
Bristow	Gronna	Perkins	Swanson
Burleigh	James	Pomerene	Thomas
Burton	Jones	Ransdell	Thompson
Camden	Kern	Reed	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lane	Saulsbury	Tillman
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	West
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Shively	White
Colt	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Williams
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Cummins	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Dillingham	Norris	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York if he could give me three minutes before he proceeds?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield for three minutes to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended to speak on this question, but as I had once spoken, I was glad to give way to others. I now desire to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, August 17, 1914.]

MISUSE OF THE FLAG.

Under the guise of an emergency measure, called for by war conditions in Europe, the bill providing for the transfer of foreign shipping to the American flag has been enlarged so as to permit the entry of foreign shipping into the American coastwise trade, even if such shipping is owned entirely by foreigners.

The war in Europe has not created any emergency which requires Americans to share their coastwise trade with foreigners or to run the risk of being driven out of their own ports by cheap foreign ships.

The bill as it stands is a snare. It is a provocation of war. It paves the way for all sorts of trouble between the United States and its friends, Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia, and Japan.

Under this bill the foreign owners of a vessel that would be subject to capture at sea under its own flag could place it under the American flag and send it to sea with a cargo of conditional contraband. They would be entitled to claim the protection of the United States, although they might really be engaged in furnishing supplies to a belligerent. The United States would be forced to abandon protection of its own shipping or quarrel with the belligerent which captured the vessel. It would become a cat's-paw for foreign shipowners.

The vessels of the Hamburg-American Line now lying idle at New York, for example, could run up the American flag and go to sea with German officers and crews, ostensibly engaged in neutral commerce. Does anyone suppose that Great Britain would not seize such vessels? Under the law of nations they are presumptively under the American flag by fraud and may be seized as prizes.

Does the United States wish to have its flag used for any such purpose? Does it wish to see vessels flying the American flag seized and condemned as lawful prizes? What becomes of the neutrality of the United States in such a case?

The pending bill would permit foreign shipowners to use the American flag to suit their own purposes during the war, and then, at the close of the war, to take their vessels and place the foreign flag over them.

The bill is, in effect, an attempt to evade the international law regarding the bona fide transfer of ships to a neutral flag. It is an effort to evade the duties of neutrality. It lends the American flag to purposes of fraud.

Congress should not pass any law which degrades the American flag. Every ship flying that flag should be an American ship, owned mostly or wholly by Americans, and engaged strictly in neutral commerce. There is no exigency which requires Congress to admit foreign vessels into the coastwise trade. Those granted American register for the foreign trade should be required to give assurance that they will become bona fide American ships and engage solely in neutral commerce. The best method of accomplishing this is to require that the vessels shall be owned by American citizens.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I also desire to insert a portion of a letter from the New York State Nautical School.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK STATE NAUTICAL SCHOOL,
17 State Street, New York, August 15, 1914.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

It is a well-known fact that the powerful foreign shipping interests that now all but monopolize our foreign carrying will never be satisfied until they acquire possession of our coastwise carrying as well. These interests are rich, powerful, determined, influential, and united, and they are arrayed against American maritime interests that are comparatively poor, weak, unassertive, vacillating, uninfluential, and divided. It is a foregone conclusion that, in such a contest so unevenly matched, the result will be disastrous to American maritime interests. * * *

What is desired is legislation of some permanent value which will encourage the building of American ships, and a change in our navigation laws. At the present time a youth can not get out his license for third mate of ocean steamers until he has reached the age of 21 years. The age limit should be reduced to 19 years, the same as prescribed by nearly all other countries for this grade of license.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM BAGLEY, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to read one paragraph from a letter received on yesterday from a man who might well be called the leader of the Democratic Party in Massachusetts. He says:

The dismissal of another 1,000 men by the Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation to-day, making 3,000 men in all suspended from employment by reason of the ill-advised and ill-timed amendments to the pending measure, results in an irreparable loss, and I am hoping that we may yet prevail in the Senate on Monday next.

A hope, Mr. President, which I am very glad to say is going to be gratified.

I also ask consent to put into the RECORD a brief article from the Boston News Bureau, of August 15, 1914, on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The article referred to is as follows:

ATLANTIC, GULF & WEST INDIES—THE HARDSHIP WHICH UNDERWOOD LAW WOULD INFLICT ILLUSTRATED BY TAKING A MALLORY LINE BOAT.

The shipping bill will work a peculiar hardship to American coastwise trade, according to the viewpoint of steamship authorities like the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co.

The hardship largely lies in the fact that foreign-built ships cost 33 per cent to 40 per cent less to construct than do American ships, such as those which exclusively make up the fleet of the Atlantic-Gulf subsidiaries.

A few figures will bring this point out clearly. Next week the Mallory line will put into commission two splendid new steamers which have cost $1,240,000. The company could have built these same identical boats in England for not over $900,000. In other words, it could have saved $340,000 if it had given the contract to English builders. But our laws at the time forbade the entrance into coastwise trade of any but American-built boats.

An equivalent English, Norwegian, German, or other foreign-built ship therefore enters into American coastwise trade with a capitalization of $340,000 less than the Mallory boat. On this $340,000 excess capitalization the Mallory Line must stand a 6 per cent interest charge on the capital employed, an allowance for 4 per cent annual depreciation, and 3 per cent for marine insurance. Here is a total of 13 per cent interest, or $44,000 per year, which must be taken care of in the operating expenses of this single steamer before the Mallory Line can begin to operate on conditions of even rivalry with a foreign-built steamer of equal capacity and accommodations.

And this $44,000 handicap applies to only two steamers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a most interesting letter from Mr. H. H. Raymond, vice president and general manager of the Clyde and Mallory Steamship Cos. I will only read five lines of the letter, as follows:

The value of the steamship property engaged in our coastwise trade all over the United States aggregates several hundred millions of dollars, and it is only equitable to the owners of this property, built in American shipyards by fiat of American law, that it should not be precipitately menaced on ex parte evidence without being accorded the opportunity of a hearing. They surely are entitled to this consideration.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MALLORY STEAMSHIP CO.,
PIER 36, NORTH RIVER, NEW YORK,
At Washington, D. C., August 17, 1914.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just read the report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the debate in the Senate on Friday, August 11, 1914, on the conference report on the emergency shipping bill. Many contradictory statements appear therein, particularly in relation to that part of the conferees' report permitting foreign-built ships admitted to American registry to participate in the coastwise trade. So apparent is the bewildering confusion of statements on this phase of the report it is self-evident that Congress is not yet in possession of facts sufficient to justify emergency legislation thereon.

As we view this matter, the emergency legislation now being formulated by the Congress is the result of the object lesson vividly presented to this country arising from the outbreak of hostilities between the leading maritime nations of the world, in that we suddenly find ourselves deprived of sufficient shipping to carry our produce to overseas markets, and the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry, it is felt, will enable us to overcome this. Just what connection this has with our domestic shipping, which is not affected by the European crisis, we are at a loss to understand.

The report of the conferees now under discussion in Congress involves two propositions bearing no relation to each other, each of which should be considered separately on its merits. Certainly it can not be contended that there is any such crisis in the coastwise shipping as would justify emergency legislation for it alone.

The existing policy of the United States, enacted in 1817, excluding foreign-built ships from our coastwise trade, has developed a shipping built in the United States and flying the American flag trading on our Atlantic and Pacific coasts, in the Gulf of Mexico, and on the Great Lakes, which a British bluebook, issued recently, characterizes as surpassing in tonnage the combined coastwise fleets of the leading maritime nations of the world, and significantly adds that it is chiefly due to this enormous volume of domestic tonnage that the United States ranks to-day as the second largest maritime nation in the world. It would seem, therefore, that our historic policy in regard to the development of our coastwise shipping has, to say the least, not been such as to warrant a resort to emergency legislation, and that before any attempt it made to reverse a policy which has been productive of such results full and thorough investigation should be undertaken and due consideration given to all the factors involved.

I may add that I have been connected with the American coastwise shipping for 30 years, and the companies with which I am connected operate a fleet of 35 steamers, aggregating more than 80,000 gross tons, and are at present taking over a new ship, to be followed in about three weeks hence by a sister ship, the largest cargo carriers in the Atlantic and Gulf coastwise trade, each of which will cost approximately $675,000, and these ships will depreciate from 33 to 40 per cent in value immediately after the passage of this bill. Not one dollar of the stock of our companies is owned or controlled by any railroad interest.

The value of the steamship property engaged in our coastwise trade all over the United States aggregates several hundred millions of dollars, and it is only equitable to the owners of this property, built in American shipyards by fiat of American law, that it should not be precipitately menaced on ex parte evidence without being accorded the opportunity of a hearing. They surely are entitled to this consideration.

Respectfully,

H. H. RAYMOND,
Vice President and General Manager
Clyde and Mallory Steamship Cos.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended in this closing hour of debate to invite attention to the fact that all the New York newspapers on yesterday in large headlines informed the country that the Hamburg-American Line had some ships that they were going to sell to the Government. I was going to discuss at considerable length the Hamburg-American Line, but will now only say that when we were in the stress of a war with Spain the Hamburg-American Line sold two of its best ships to the Spanish Government, and they were used against our country in that contest. I do not think that we owe the Hamburg-American Line any favors, and I trust that in any negotiation for ships for the foreign trade which may be made no particular favors will be granted to that corporation.

That corporation is the expectant beneficiary of this legislation. What has the Hamburg-American Line ever done to merit such distinguished consideration at the hands of the United States? I recall, as do some of the other older Members of this body, that this country of ours was placed in a very critical position by the lack of large merchant steamships as transports, auxiliary cruisers, and supply ships in the War with Spain in 1898. So greatly were our War and Navy Departments handicapped that if the full truth at that time had been known it would have appalled the American people. Some of us remember the motley crowd of transports hurriedly assembled to carry the United States soldiers from our southern ports to Santiago, Cuba, a fleet only the safe arrival of which—so said Admiral Dewey and the General Board of the Navy in a report to the merchant-marine commission a few years ago—could ever have justified its starting.

So that Senators may understand the character of this huge foreign corporation, in whose interest primarily we are asked to-day to tear up the historic navigation policy of the United States, I will briefly state some facts. The Hamburg-American management in the summer of 1898 signalized its friendship to the American people, whose patronage had made it prosperous, by taking two of its fastest and largest steamships out of its New York service—ships built for and sustained by the money of American travelers—and deliberately and knowingly sold those ships to the Spanish Government to be armed as Spanish cruisers and to be commissioned to "burn, sink, and destroy" the ships and the commerce of the United States.

One of these steamships thus transferred to the service of our enemies was the Normannia; the other was the Columbia. They were renamed the Rapido and the Patriota, under the Spanish naval flag. One of them made a part of the Spanish fleet which was hastily sent by the Spanish admiralty out through the Mediterranean via the Suez Canal to strike Admiral Dewey after his memorable victory in Manila Bay, which fleet was ordered back to Spain from Suez at the news of the second American victory and the complete destruction of Cervera's fleet in the great sea fight off Santiago.

One of these Hamburg liners was taken back by her thrifty owners from the Spanish Government after the war was ended and there was no more use for her against the American flag. For all I know, this ship may be one of the Hamburg liners now waiting in an American port for the passage of this bill, to be let loose with her German officers and crew in the coast trade of the United States.

Let me make one further observation about this proposed beneficiary of the legislation provided for in the report of the conference committee. Soon after the Spanish War some of the Senators of the United States, impressed with the need of a real American merchant marine, formed a committee for a frank and earnest study of the question. The leader in this movement was the late Senator William P. Frye, of Maine, one of the best and noblest men who ever sat in this Chamber. Senator Frye, with his unflagging industry and devoted patriotism, framed a bill which he believed would help the situation. Hardly had he introduced it before the then and present head of the Hamburg-American Company, Herr Ballin, of Hamburg, came flying over the Atlantic, and in a long and heated statement given out to the newspapers in New York attacked Senator Frye and his proposition, and, indeed, assailed any and every effort, either by subsidy, by preferential duty, or any other expedient, to build up American shipping in the over-seas trade, a monopoly of over 90 per cent of which was and is securely held by Herr Ballin and other foreigners. That extraordinary alien interference with the lawmaking powers of the United States—interference by the head of the very steamship company which had affronted and angered the American people by the thrifty sale of fast steamships to our enemy in our war with Spain—was not then misunderstood and is not now forgotten. It is the belief of many of us that one powerful factor in the several defeats of American shipping legislation in this country has been the wide influence exercised against the American flag on the ocean by the wealthy and formidable European steamship companies, of which the Hamburg-American is perhaps the chief. It was disclosed during an inquiry a few years ago by a committee of the other House of Congress that the two great German steamship companies had their regular representatives, unknown to the management, in the office of the Associated Press at Washington.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is to close the debate, for giving me a few minutes of his time, and will content myself by expressing gratification over the fact that this conference report, which ought never to have been brought into this body, is going to be rejected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the character of the discussion in the Senate to-day might very well suggest the inquiry as to whether the Congress of the United States is not devoting all of its energies to the protection of special interests rather than to the promotion of the general welfare. That question must suggest itself to every citizen in the country who takes note of what we are doing.

In years gone by repeated efforts have been made to reform the navigation laws of the United States, but powerful private interests have overcome every patriotic effort made in the Congress to that end, and those powerful interests have apparently lost none of their influence in this day.

But a few months ago Senators on both sides of this Chamber declaimed against the coastwise shipping trade in this country as an offensive and oppressive monopoly and as a special interest favored by Government protection. Senators who then were eloquent in denouncing this monopoly find no difficulty to-day in standing in the Senate and by one argument or another urging a vote which will foster and perpetuate this monopoly that has fastened itself upon the American people. Why, Mr. President, I could scarcely believe my ears and my eyes to-day on hearing Senators professing allegiance to the Democratic creed paraphrasing every stock argument that has been made by Republicans for 20 years back in support of the protective tariff. It is not an inspiring sight to see Democrats employ the arguments which have been used during all these years by Republicans in support of the repudiated, discredited, and un-American system of protection.

What will be gained by the defeat of the report of the conferees? This monopoly will continue to monopolize the enormous internal trade of the United States without competition. Every four years for a long period we Democrats have promised legislation that would improve our merchant marine; but we have always coupled with our declarations the statement that the building of a merchant marine must not be by a subsidy. Now, in this emergency, which is recognized by everyone, we seek to enlarge our merchant marine by going into the markets of the world and buying ships as we buy other commodities and bring them here to fly the American flag. In this connection let me call your attention at this time to a statement made by President Wilson in accepting the nomination of the Democratic Party two years ago:

> The very fact that we have at last taken the Panama Canal seriously in hand and are vigorously pushing it toward completion is eloquent of our reawakened interest in international trade. We are not building the canal and pouring out million upon million of money upon its construction merely to establish a water connection between the two coasts of the continent, important, and desirable as that may be, particularly from the point of view of naval defense. It is meant to be a great international highway. It would be a little ridiculous if we should build it and then have no ships to send through it.

Some reference was made a few moments ago by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to the number of available ships in the coastwise trade. He correctly stated that on the evidence of Mr. Chamberlain, our Commissioner of Navigation, of the 26,000 craft in our coastwise trade there were about 370 fit for service through the Panama Canal; but it should be remembered that by the Panama Canal act of two years ago the Congress, dealing then with this monopoly, excluded from the use of the canal the ships owned by railroads and purchased by them for the purpose of destroying water competition, and also excluded ships owned or controlled by shipping combinations operated in defiance of the Sherman antitrust law; and it is estimated that because of those exclusions only 8 per cent of the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States to-day will be permitted to pass through the Panama Canal. On that basis the Commissioner of Navigation estimated that the total number of vessels in the American coastwise trade available for use in the Panama Canal will not exceed 33.

Now, Senators, do you meet the hopes and expectations of the American Nation when, after spending nearly a half billion dollars of their money on the canal and after it is open, as it was opened yesterday, there are but 33 vessels flying the American flag that can operate through it? Do you recognize how potential the defeat of the conference report will be in furthering the aims of that monopoly? If only 33 vessels can enjoy the advantage of that great trade, what tribute can they not levy upon the producer, upon the shipper, and ultimately upon the consumer of the country. Do you propose to inflict this burden upon the people?

We had hoped by this measure to bring a large number of foreign-built ships, owned by American citizens and American corporations under the American flag and operated under American law. In addition to other advantages, the owners of these vessels would contribute under the income tax of this country a part of their earnings for the national welfare.

Mr. President, let me continue with one or two more lines from the address of President Wilson:

> There have been years when not a single ton of freight passed through the great Suez Canal in an American bottom, so empty are the seas of our ships and seamen. We must mean to put an end to that kind of thing or we would not be cutting a new canal at our very doors merely for the use of our men-of-war. We must build—

Senators, note the words of your President—

> We must build and buy ships in competition with the world. We can do it if we will but give ourselves leave.

Now, Democratic Senators, are you prepared to repudiate the solemn declaration of your President? Are you prepared to repudiate the declarations of your party in the past, or are you to give another exemplification of what some believe to be a truth once uttered by Gen. Hancock when he was a candidate against Gen. Garfield in 1880, when he declared that, after all, the tariff is a local issue? Because you have shipping interests in your State, do you think you are relieved of your solemn duty under the Constitution to advance the public welfare? Must your personal local interests in your State be forever paramount against the rights of the American Nation? This day you may take your choice and accept either standard. You may say, as has been said by one or more Senators, "Pass this law, and you destroy a $10,000,000 enterprise in my State." Another Senator says, "Pass this law, and you destroy a $15,000,000 enterprise in my State." But I beg to remind the Senators that when they were really orthodox in their Democracy a year ago in passing the tariff law they found no hesitation in putting sugar on the free list, even though it inflicted a loss upon the industries of the State of Louisiana of $40,000,000. It all depends upon whose ox is gored. Sometimes principle is thrown to the winds and men abandon high purpose and find refuge in expediency. Certain Senators have declared on the floor to-day that they believe that it would be a wise and wholesome policy to allow any American citizen to go abroad and buy a ship and bring it in and fly the American flag, and yet Senators making that declaration at the same time say, in substance, "This is not the time that I want my views to prevail. I do not want that policy inaugurated just yet."

Mr. President, my time is about concluding. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate further; but I want to repeat what I said in the beginning—that every time an effort has been made to reform our antiquated navigation laws a powerful private interest has been able to compass the defeat of such legislation. The day must come when the people will be heard and their interests be respected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the conference report be adopted?

Mr. O'GORMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURLEIGH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I am compelled to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when Mr. CRAWFORD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold by vote, but if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. BRYAN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]; but it has been announced that if he were here he would vote "nay," and as I am going to vote "nay," I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when Mr. OLIVER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. OLIVER] is absent, and is paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I have been unable to secure a transfer. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." Under the circumstances I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. Were my colleague present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—20.

Ashurst	Kern	Shafroth	Thornton
Borah	Lane	Sheppard	Tillman
Bryan	O'Gorman	Shively	Vardaman
Hughes	Poindexter	Simmons	Walsh
Jones	Ransdell	Thompson	Williams

NAYS—40.

Crawford	Lodge	Root	Thomas
Culberson	McLean	Sherman	Townsend
du Pont	Myers	Shields	Warren
Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.	Works

So the conference report was rejected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in view of the action just taken by the Senate, I move that the Senate recede from its amendments to the House bill and adopt the House bill.

Mr. BORAH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). In view of my general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when Mr. CRAWFORD'S name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (when his name was called). On the announcement of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] I understand that if the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] were present he would vote "yea." Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when Mr. OLIVER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. OLIVER] is absent, and is paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and my inability to secure a transfer. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN'S name was called). I desire to repeat the announcement of the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I make the same announcement as before, and vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—41.

Ashurst	Hughes	Overman	Swanson
Bryan	James	Penrose	Thompson
Burleigh	Johnson	Perkins	Thornton

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate recedes from its amendment, and the House bill stands passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented a petition of the Cigar Makers' Local Union No. 179, of Bangor, Me., praying for the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch No. 209, of the National Association of Civil Service Employees, of Augusta, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of Concord Lodge, No. 537, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the inspection of safety appliances by boiler inspectors, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Nebraska, praying for the enactment of legislation for the recognition of Dr. Cook in his polar efforts, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fitchburg, Osterville, Marstons Mills, Clinton, and of the congregation of the First Swedish Baptist Church, of Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Pittsfield, Mass., praying for the postponement of further consideration of the pending trust bills until the next session of Congress, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRISTOW presented petitions of sundry citizens of Mankato, Luray, and Coffeyville, all in the State of Kansas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Topeka, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of Rev. W. A. Parkinson, of Barnum, and of Eidsvold Lodge, No. 23, and Hugnad Lodge, No. 39, International Order of Good Templars, of St. Paul, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented petitions of sundry citizens of Passaic, N. J., praying that strict neutrality be observed toward the European belligerents, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Washington, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Washington, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., favoring the revision of the navigation laws, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4150) for the relief of Eva M. Bowman, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill, together with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3941) for the relief of Omer D. Lewis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 6266) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12919) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 747) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 6272) granting a pension to Charles W. Coolidge, jr. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

SALARIES OF RURAL LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. PENROSE. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I call the special attention of the committee to the bill.

The bill (S. 6280) providing for the salaries of rural letter carriers was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER LOCKS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I send to the desk a joint resolution. It is very short, and I ask that it lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 181) authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the contractor for building locks on Black Warrior River to proceed with the work without interruption to completion was read twice by its title, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, permit the contractor for building locks and Dam No. 17, on Black Warrior River, to proceed with the work specified in the contract made in pursuance of the act of Congress approved August 22, 1911, and to carry the said work to completion without interruption on account of the exhaustion of available funds, it being understood that the contractor is to rely upon future appropriations for payment and that no payment for said work will be made until funds shall have been provided and made available therefor by Congress.

THE RED CROSS.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which I send to the desk. It pertains to the Red Cross and is made necessary by the omission of an amendment to the shipping bill which was added by the Senate. I trust there will be no objection to the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 178) granting authority to the American Red Cross to charter a ship or ships of foreign register for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of that society was read the first time by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That authority be granted to the American Red Cross during the continuance of the present war to charter a ship or ships of foreign register, to carry the American flag, for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of said society.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL CLAIMS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6120) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MESSENGER TO SENATOR GORE.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 441), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senator THOMAS P. GORE be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

Mr. CHILTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 442), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas the production of crude oil has during the past 30 years come to be one of the great industries of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, and other States, and hundreds of millions of dollars of capital is invested in the oil business in these States, rendering the business health of vast sections dependent upon this industry; and

Whereas it is alleged that through the ownership and control of a system of pipe lines through the oil fields, furnishing the only practical means of transportation, the Standard Oil Co., with its various subsidiaries and branches, has for years fixed the price of crude oil at its pleasure, and has thereby made the oil market; and

Whereas it is claimed that the Standard Oil Co. and the owners thereof have built up this condition until it has become substantially the only purchaser of crude oil in the States named, through the South Penn Oil Co., the Joseph Seep Purchasing Agency, and others, in fact, representing said Standard Oil Co., and that as such sole transporters and purchasers it has always solicited the business and production of independent oil operators and has purchased all the oil produced by them at a market price so fixed by itself; and

Whereas said course so pursued by said Standard Oil Co. is alleged to have created the conditions which have prevailed in the oil fields, including a market for all said product, thereby inducing thousands of citizens to invest their money in the oil-producing business, relying upon a continuation of the conditions so created by said company; and

Whereas it now appears that said Standard Oil Co., through the various pipe lines and purchasing agents it is alleged to control, has recently revolutionized the conditions of the oil business in the States named above not only as to price, but by refusing to run more than 25 per cent, or thereabouts, of the oil produced, and refusing to buy the product of the wells, thereby reversing the policy always heretofore followed, bringing chaos and ruin in the said oil fields and threatening the destruction of hundreds of millions of property, and the loss of the many millions of dollars of capital it so induced citizens to invest in the oil business in said States; and

Whereas it is alleged that said action on the part of said Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries, controlled companies, and purchasing agencies is monopolistic and in restraint and destruction of trade between the several States, and is therefore unlawful, and that such action is arbitrary and fraudulent; and

Whereas said conditions of the oil industry vitally affect the happiness and prosperity of thousands of our people, and if resulting from the causes alleged, such injustice is remediable by Congress under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the Senate is hereby created, its members to be appointed by the President of the Senate, for the purpose and with direction to make thorough investigation of the conditions prevailing and that have prevailed in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, or elsewhere, affecting the production, transportation, and marketing of crude petroleum, with especial reference to the manner in which the market for same has been created, maintained, and controlled, and by whom, and the effect of such market and the maintenance and control thereof upon the inducement of capital to seek investment in the oil business, and especially in the development of new fields.

Said committee shall also ascertain what connection or relation of any kind has existed or now exists between or among any two or more of the pipe-line companies which have been or are now transporting crude oil within said fields, together with what, if any, common ownership, interest, or control has at any time existed or now exists between such pipe lines or any of them, and the various agencies that have purchased crude oil in said States since 1890, and what disposition such agencies have made of the crude oil so purchased, and to whom it has been turned over for refining and manufacture, and under what conditions, with the object of ascertaining for the information of the Senate whether the charge is true that substantially the same interests have operated the pipe lines, made the market, bought the crude oil, refined it, and fixed the price of the refined products, and whether in such respect the laws of the United States have been violated.

Said committee shall also inquire into, and ascertain if it is true that said pipe-line companies or any of them have recently stopped taking all or any part of the crude oil produced by independent producers into tanks to which such pipe-line companies have connected their pipe lines, and whether it is true that said purchasing agencies or any of them have recently stopped purchasing all or any part of the crude oil so produced by independent producers in said States, together with any information such committee may be able to obtain as to the reasons for such refusal to run and purchase oil, and what effect the same is having upon the oil industry, and especially properties already developed in the States named.

Said committee is authorized to sit in the recess of the Senate, and at any point in the United States, to employ such counsel, clerks, and stenographers as it may find necessary, to summon and swear witnesses, send for persons and papers and to do any other things necessary to the success of the investigation committed to it. Said committee shall report to the Senate its findings, together with the evidence taken, when its work hereunder is completed, and shall make reports from time to time as required by the Senate.

All expenses incurred by said committee hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. PITTMAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5673) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest,' approved March 2, 1911," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same.

KEY PITTMAN,
WILLIAM HUGHES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to explain the amendment. From the conference report I can not judge what it proposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is but one amendment, and that is the amendment of the House providing that any proceeds derived from any oil within a naval reserve shall be put in a naval fund, subject to the appropriation of Congress thereafter.

Mr. SMOOT. This is only the temporary bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. This is only the temporary bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PAY OF RURAL LETTER CARRIERS.

Mr. OWEN. I present a letter from the Postmaster General, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1914.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: The unit of compensation for duty performed by letter carriers in the Rural Delivery Service of the Post Office Department has finally reached a point, through the action of the Congress in prescribing a maximum salary of $1,200 per annum, where the entire subject of adequate remuneration for service rendered in rural delivery and the return received therefrom is vital to the welfare of the country and the proper and efficient administration of the Postal Service.

This administration is committed to the fundamental principle that economy shall prevail in the public service, and that any expenditure of the money of the people shall bear some fixed relation to the returns received from such expenditure. Now, therefore, when $53,000,000 of the people's money is expended annually for the maintenance and extension of postal facilities to patrons anywhere, and the returns therefrom, as ascertained after careful investigation, do not exceed $10,000,000 (in 1912 the actual returns were $7,570,000), it is time that those charged with the responsibility of administering the distribution of such a huge sum at such a tremendous loss should earnestly endeavor, in a spirit of justice and equity, to provide a means whereby the maximum income from the expenditure might be secured.

This discrepancy and the discrimination that prevailed in the compensation of the employees in the Rural Service were so self-evident and so startling as to command immediate attention, and prior to the enactment of the legislation hereinbefore mentioned the department had carefully investigated ways and means that would reduce the annual loss of more than $40,000,000 that now appears in the operation of this service, and which is rapidly rendering prohibitive the cost of further extension thereof for the benefit of the people, and had arrived at the conclusion that the compensation of the employees engaged therein was entirely adequate for the work performed, subject to a radical revision of the unfair and unequal basis upon which such compensation was fixed. The attitude of the department was materially influenced by the enormous number of applications presented to the Civil Service Commission for employment at the prevailing rate of pay.

A careful survey of the details involved in the rural mail delivery developed these unusual conditions, in that the personnel engaged in such delivery, which was inaugurated in the year 1896, then received a uniform compensation of $300 per annum.

In 1898 this was increased to $400 per annum.
In 1900 this was increased to $500 per annum.
In 1902 this was increased to $600 per annum.
In 1904 this was increased to $720 per annum.
In 1907 this was increased to $900 per annum.
In 1911 this was increased to $1,000 per annum.
In 1912 this was increased to $1,100 per annum.

In each and every instance where increased compensation was authorized certain good reason therefor was apparent to the Congress, yet the mileage factor, which constituted the sole basis of compensation, was never changed by the department.

During this session of Congress a pernicious lobby, encouraged by the circulation of a sheet known as the "R. F. D. News," and labeled "The official organ of the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association," advocated the increase of the maximum salary of rural letter carriers to the extent of $100 additional per annum, ostensibly on account of the increase in the amount of mail matter carried, due to the establishment of the parcel-post feature of postal activity. This proposition to increase the annual cost of operation of the rural delivery mail service to the extent of $4,500,000 was further promoted by the periodical visits of certain officers of the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association, an organization presumably formed within the carrier body to cooperate with the department in the advancement of the Postal Service, but which in reality has degenerated to a point where, in the opinion of the department, it exercises a baneful influence over the service and incites the carrier body to political reprisal upon the Representatives of the people in Congress who may have the courage to deny its demands or defy its vengeance. Largely through the influence and activities of "the official organ" certain carriers submitted grossly exaggerated, misleading, and untrue statements to Members of Congress relative to the cost of maintaining service on their several routes. A circular, issued from the same source, dated July 29, 1914, boasts of the success of the methods pursued and tells of plans for further legislation, and mentions an allowance for equipment, etc., as the next avenue of approach.

Now, the annual maximum compensation of the rural carriers was fixed at $1,200, effective July 1, 1914, and the department, while not consulted as to the necessity for the increase in compensation, has earnestly endeavored to adjust the salaries of the employees in an equitable manner on the basis of additional service rendered.

Our further survey disclosed that on a very large number of daily routes more than 20,000 pieces and more than 2,500 pounds of mail are handled each month, whereas on other daily routes of equal length less than 3,000 pieces and less than 500 pounds are handled monthly. The following tables illustrate the woeful lack of attention which has heretofore been given to this most important factor involved in the equitable and definite relationship that should prevail between the amount of work performed and the amount of money paid therefor:

A most cursory examination or comparison of these two tables shows conclusively that some readjustment of compensation for rural carriers was an imperative necessity. This the department has done, as it set forth in the inclosed order dated July 14, 1914.

To secure the increase of $100 in pay, as authorized by the Congress, a carrier shall transport each month 10,000 pieces of mail, which has been ascertained as the average carried in the past over a standard route, and not less than 1,300 pounds of mailable matter. You will note that this requires the carriage of one parcel of the maximum weight established by the regulation (50 pounds), or its equivalent in weight of mail matter of other classes, and is apparently in strict compliance with the intent of the Congress to provide for a higher compensation for the greater service rendered, due to the extra duty involved in handling the parcel post.

A return to the former mileage basis, as is suggested in certain bills introduced, would be inequitable and unjust to certain carriers whose compensation has now been very materially increased beyond that which has been paid them heretofore, and will include, in addition to those entered upon the tables above mentioned showing increases over $100 each, many thousands of other employees not so included, since it has been impossible as yet to complete the comparative tabulation of the entire service.

Your attention is also invited to the fact that under the new system certain pecuniary recognition is given to the carriage of closed pouches of mail to post offices located on rural routes, and to those carriers who serve routes in excess of 25 miles in length. The employees themselves have been insistent that both these factors should be considered in any revision of their salary schedule. Neither has heretofore been recognized by the Congress nor by the department. Thus the weight and number of pieces as an additional factor again illustrate their usefulness as a matter of equity and justice.

Finally, not a single employee in the Rural Service suffers any decrease in the compensation heretofore paid, and the only sentiment which is either material or relevant to the equity involved is that which has been created by the unfortunate dissemination of unauthorized information to the effect that all carriers in the Rural Delivery Service would receive an increase of one-eleventh in their annual rate of pay, regardless of the argument used in support of the requests for such increase or the facts that warrant the proper distribution of the increase in proportion to the actual work involved or amount of mail matter transported.

The future advancement and promotion of efficiency in the Rural Mail Service will undoubtedly be influenced by the attitude of the Congress on this subject. Shall these employees receive compensation in proportion to the amount of work performed, and the arduous nature thereof, as is the case in all other lines of employment throughout this country, or shall a special privilege be granted to certain of their number to receive the same remuneration for extremely limited service rendered, and who, for instance, may utilize a motor vehicle on highly improved highways, carrying in some cases only 10 pounds of mail matter in less than three hours daily, and then engage in other lines of competitive activity remunerative to themselves, while their fellow employees not so favored must perform eight hours of service daily on difficult mountain highways, carrying over 300 pounds of mail matter? The department has sincerely endeavored to remedy this gross injustice, and believes that the patrons of the Postal Service will recognize the substantial equity involved in the principle that the salary of an employee should be proportionate to the work performed.

Further, in the interest of thousands of prospective patrons it is the earnest desire of the department to continue the extension, and increase the frequency of the Rural Delivery Service, and plans have already been formulated whereby the delivery zone may be doubled, the accomplishment of which will be sadly handicapped when the available resources for the purpose have been otherwise applied.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

ORDER NO. 8246.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 14, 1914.

On and after July 1, 1914, the compensation of rural carriers shall be based upon the length of routes and the number of pieces and the weight of mail carried as shown by the records of the department; and their rates of pay shall be computed on and fixed according to the following schedule:

Schedule.

Length of route.	Salary base.	Pieces of mail per month.	Pounds of mail per month.
4 miles and less than 6 miles	$480	3,000	400
6 miles and less than 8 miles	528	3,700	490
8 miles and less than 10 miles	576	4,400	580
10 miles and less than 12 miles	624	5,100	670

An increase or decrease of $12 per annum shall be made for each 1,000 pieces and for each 100 pounds, respectively, greater or less than the schedule; and an allowance of $12 per annum shall be made for each closed pouch or closed sack of mail carried per day, and also for each full mile of route served in excess of 25 miles in length:

Provided, That no carrier shall be reduced in present compensation because of this order, and that $1,200 per annum shall be the maximum salary.

A carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis and subject to the above conditions for a route one-half the combined length of the two routes.

The compensation of carriers on newly established routes shall be at the rates in effect June 30, 1914.

Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, August 13, 1914.

HON. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: In reply to your recent letter with reference to the readjustment of the pay of rural letter carriers, effective July 1, 1914, I beg to invite your attention to the inclosed copy of the order of the Postmaster General and explanatory statement concerning it. (See Order No. 8246, above.)

You will observe that in order to receive $1,200 per annum on a route 24 or more miles in length, a carrier is expected to deliver and collect a monthly average of 1,300 pounds and 10,000 pieces of mail. This requires the carriage of 50 pounds (equivalent to one parcel of the maximum weight) and 400 pieces of mail a day. On a very large number of daily routes more than 20,000 pieces and more than 2,500 pounds are handled each month, while on many other daily routes less than 4,000 pieces are handled. It is not proposed, however, to reduce any carrier's salary below the schedule in effect June 30, 1914.

The effect of this order will be largely to equalize the salaries of the carriers. It establishes, as is the case in all other lines of employment, an equitable and definite relationship between the amount of work performed and the amount of money paid therefor. Furthermore, on a considerable number of routes less than 24 miles in length, where a large amount of mail is handled, the carriers will receive a materially greater increase than if a mere flat addition of one-eleventh to the salaries of all carriers had been authorized. It seemed essential that the department should recognize the greater duty and responsibility thus involved, as the carriers who perform service under such conditions are undoubtedly entitled to remuneration in proportion. A partial list of such cases, taken at random from the files, is inclosed for your information, as is also a similar list showing the amount and weight of mail handled on routes where no increases have been authorized, and where it seems obvious from the amount of work performed that none should be authorized.

I also call your attention to the fact that the order provides some measure of financial return to carriers who serve routes in excess of 25 miles in length and who carry pouches of mail to post offices located on their routes. The employees themselves have been insistent that both of these factors be considered to some extent in fixing their pay, but neither has heretofore ever been recognized by Congress or by the department.

With reference to the complaint of the rural carriers at Reed, Okla., transmitted with your communication referred to above, I beg to state that the amount of mail handled by these carriers, as shown by reports recently submitted by the postmaster, is not such as to entitle them to additional compensation.

Sincerely, yours,

JAMES I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

JULY 31, 1914.

The Postmaster General issued an order to-day promulgating the schedule of salaries to be paid carriers in the rural delivery service from July 1, 1914, in accordance with the recent act of Congress providing $1,200 per annum as the maximum pay of these employees.

Heretofore the unit of compensation upon which the salaries of carriers has been based included only the number of miles traversed, without any consideration of the time required to travel such mileage or the amount of work performed by the carrier during such travel.

The Postmaster General concluded that the time had arrived when certain recognition should be given to some additional features involved in the collection and delivery of the mail on rural routes, and that the most important item for particular attention was the improvement in the efficiency of the rural mail delivery, in order that the patrons of the service should receive the maximum return for the enormous expenditure involved, and that the remuneration of the employees engaged therein should bear some fixed relation to the amount of service rendered. To this end it was equally essential that the new features thus introduced should not interfere with or reduce the basis of compensation which heretofore prevailed and which was regarded as adequate, but should also establish equity, in so far as possible, in the compensation paid to the employees who now perform, and who have in the past performed, particularly arduous and difficult duty.

The establishment of the parcel post has been utilized as an argument for the necessity for increased compensation to postal employees. During the period that has elapsed since the inauguration of this very meritorious addition to postal activity the department has carefully ascertained the actual results produced on each rural route and every consideration has been given to the information thus secured in this order of the Postmaster General, now in effect. The basis of computation for maximum compensation requires the transportation of one parcel-post package per day of the maximum weight now established by the postal regulations, or the equivalent thereof in any mailable matter, and the handling of an average of 400 pieces of mail daily.

The order further provides that on routes less than the standard length (24 miles), where carriers have been receiving less than the former maximum pay of $1,100 a year, an increase or decrease of $12 per annum greater or less than the schedule pay shall be made to or from the prescribed salary for such route for each 1,000 pieces, and for each 100 pounds of mail handled monthly, up to the maximum of $1,200 per annum. It also stipulates that an allowance of $12 per year shall be made for each closed pouch or sack of mail transported by carriers to post offices located on rural routes.

The Postmaster General believes that the new order will encourage the carriers to use all legitimate means to increase the business on their routes and that it will be a further incentive to the patrons to utilize the rural service in the transportation of articles by parcel post, in that the increase in the weight or number of pieces thus transported will indirectly have an immediate effect upon the remuneration of the carrier.

It is self-evident that the promulgation of this order is one of the first steps toward the improvement in the efficiency of the rural delivery mail service and the elimination to a large extent of the tremendous disparity that exists between the revenues and the expenditure in this particular branch of the service.

AUGUST 6, 1914.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
The Postmaster General, City.

DEAR SIR: Please advise me upon what basis the compensation of rural carriers was fixed prior to June 30, 1914, and the present basis of such compensation; and if a change has been made, I should be glad to know what the reasons were which actuated the department in making the change.

Please advise me whether the Post Office Department is now self-supporting, and especially whether the parcel post is self-supporting.

Yours, very truly,

_____ _____.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 14, 1914.

Hon. R. L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: In further reply to your communication of August 6, I beg leave to state that should the plans of the department prevail whereby economy in the operation of the Postal Service may be established, there is no doubt whatever that the Postal Service in general will show that it is self-supporting and that the returns from the parcel post will be most gratifying in particular.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on August 15, 1914, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 4966. An act proposing an amendment to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes;

S. 5313. An act to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same; and for other purposes; and

S. 6031. An act authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, one of the most important features of the pending bill, commonly known as the Clayton bill or antitrust bill—H. R. 15657—is the exemption of labor and farmers' organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws. It was never intended that these organizations should be included within the terms of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and it was a source of great surprise to the country when some of the courts took a different view. The law was originally designed to cover industrial combinations, as is clearly demonstrated by a review of the various speeches made in 1890, at the time of the passage of the act.

The senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] a few days ago, in a very able and convincing argument on this subject, read into the RECORD the expressions of the author of the law, Senator Hoar, and also remarks from Senator Teller, which I again call attention to.

I desire to have these inserted as part of my remarks. They have already been read, and I will not again read the arguments used at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate, page 2729, March 27, 1890. Mr. Hoar.]

When you are speaking of providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, or in iron, or in woolen or in cotton goods, speculating in them or lawfully dealing in them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the State. It is the creation or diffusion or change of ownership of the wealth of the community. But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the Government and the character of the State itself.

The maintenance of a certain standard of profit in dealing in large transactions in wheat or cotton or wool is a question whether a particular merchant or a particular class of merchants shall make money or not; but the question whether the standard of the laborer's wages shall be maintained or advanced, or whether the leisure for instruction, for improvement shall be shortened or lengthened is a question which touches the very existence and character of government of the State itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishing his purpose in whole or in part in endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in an occupation the success of which makes republican government itself possible, and without which the Republic can not, in substance, however it may nominally do in form, continue to exist.

I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations, who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that, we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

When, on the other hand, we are dealing with one of the other classes, the combinations aimed at chiefly by this bill, we are dealing with a transaction the only purpose of which is to extort from the community, monopolize, segregate, and apply to individual use, for the purposes of individual greed, wealth which ought properly and lawfully and for the public interest to be generally diffused over the whole community.

I know that nobody here proposes to interfere with the class of men I have mentioned. Nobody here intends that by any of these provisions, either in the original bill or in any amendment, and I have only called attention to it to see if the efforts of those who have undertaken to manage this subject can not in some way confine the bill to dealing with trusts, which we all admit are offensive to good morals.

* * * * * * *

I want to repeat that I am exceedingly anxious myself to join in anything that shall break up and destroy these unholy combinations, but I want to be careful that in doing that we do not do more damage than we do good. I know how these great trusts, these great corporations, these large moneyed institutions can escape the provisions of a penal statute, and I know how much more likely they are to escape than the men who have less influence and less money. Therefore I suggest that the Senators who have this subject in charge give it special attention, and by a little modification it may be possible to relieve the bill of any doubt on that point.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia in the initial decision on this question in the case of American Federation of Labor v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (33 App. Cases D. C., 83), recognizes the absolute right of labor to organize, to conduct peaceable strikes, and to resort to all lawful means to accomplish any lawful purpose, as shown in the opinion on pages 114 and 115:

The right of laboring men to organize into unions and the right of these unions to conduct peaceable strikes is justified because of their inability to compete single-handed in contests with their employers. In this competition any peaceable and lawful means may be resorted to, and it is only when the means employed becomes unlawful that the courts will interfere. The law recognizes the right of both labor and capital to organize. The contest between employer and employee is one which courts of equity should recognize as entitled to be fought out upon the basis of equality; and the rule applied by the courts to the strike is based, I think, upon that principle. The fundamental principle underlying this contest is that the employer who employs 1,000 workmen is in possession of the same competitive power to force those workmen to his terms as the 1,000 men, by the most powerful lawful organization, have to force him into a compliance with their terms. The contest, therefore, opens with the one on one side and a thousand on the other upon a substantial basis of equality. The employer has a property right in his business which he asks the courts to protect, and which is entitled to protection. It consists, among other things, in his right to employ whom he pleases. He may use in his business such types of machinery and appliances as he may think adapted to carry on his work most successfully, so long as they are reasonably safe and sanitary. The law protects him in these rights, and the courts will require others to respect them. On the other hand, the thousand employees have a property right in their labor, which is equally sacred with that of the employer. They have a right to engage their services wherever and to whomsoever they can secure the largest rewards and the fairest treatment. They have a right to cease working for their employer, with due regard for their contractual relations, when, in their judgment, they can better their condition by so doing. They have a right to organize for this purpose, and they have a right to advise others to join their organization, and the law will protect them in the exercise of these rights equally with the rights of the employer. The refusal of the employees to work for the employer may result in his financial ruin, but the loss will be no greater than the damage his refusal to employ the 1,000 laborers may work in the aggregate upon them and those dependent upon their labor. In this contest between employer and employed, it should be remembered that the one who most strictly recognizes and observes the legal and equitable rights of the other enters the struggle with tremendous odds in his favor.

It was also the doctrine of the common law that a thing which is lawful when done by one person does not become unlawful when done by two or more persons in combination, provided no unlawful means is agreed upon or used.

The courts have held, and I refer now to this same labor decision which was against labor at that time:

Employees have a perfect legal right to fix a price upon their labor and to refuse to work unless that price is obtained. They have that right both as individuals and in combinations. They may organize to improve their condition and to secure better wages. They may even use persuasion to have others join their organization. They have an unquestionable right to present their cause to the public in newspapers or circulars in a peaceable way, but with no attempt at coercion. If ruin to the employer results from their peaceable assertion of these rights, it is a damage without remedy. But the law does not permit either employer or employee to use force, violence, threats of force, or threats of violence, intimidation, or coercion. (My Maryland Lodge, No. 186, of Machinists, v. Adt (1905), 100 Md., 238, 249; 68 L. R. A., 752. See also National Protective Asso. v. Cumming, 170 N. Y., 315, 321; 58 L. R. A., 135.)

The opposition claim that the exemption of labor and farmer organizations would be unconstitutional by reason of discriminating between classes of citizens, and therefore denying the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and that such legislation is new and unheard of in the operation of general laws.

In answer to this argument I call attention to the exemption provision of the section imposing a tax on corporations under the tariff law of 1909, approved and signed by President Taft, as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing in this section contained shall apply to labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, or to fraternal beneficiary societies—

And so forth. I also refer to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Flint v. Stone, Tracy & Co. (220 U. S., 107) on the validity of this provision, wherein the court held:

As to the objection that certain organizations, labor, agricultural and horticultural, fraternal and benevolent societies, loan and building associations, and those for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, are excepted from the operation of the law, we find nothing in them to invalidate the tax. As we have had frequent occasions to say, the decisions of this court from an early date to the present time have emphasized the right of Congress to select the objects of excise taxation, and within this power to tax some and leave others untaxed, must be included the right to make exemptions such as are found in this act.

That there is nothing uncommon or pernicious in provisions of this kind is further shown by a similar provision in the Simmons-Underwood tariff law recently enacted by Congress. In the section dealing with the income tax is found the following provision:

Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall apply to labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, or to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares, or to fraternal beneficiary societies—

And so forth. Farmers are specifically exempted from the benefits of the Federal bankruptcy law. If it was legal to single out and deprive farmers as a class of the benefits given others under the bankruptcy law, it should also be legal to give them whatever advantage they may derive of exemption from the antitrust laws.

It will also be remembered that all annual incomes under $3,000 are exempt under the income-tax law, and that the compensation of all officials and employees of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, is exempt except when paid by the United States Government. The question is not whether a distinction is actually made, but whether such distinction is just and equitable and whether the results in making the distinction promote the welfare of the greatest number of the people and thereby contribute to the general good of the Government.

In the construction of a State statute involving almost the identical language in question, in the case of State v. Coyle, criminal court of appeals of Oklahoma (130 Pacific Reporter, 316), where the contention was made that this exemption of labor combinations is unconstitutional as discriminatory between classes of citizens and not affording the equal protection of the laws which the Constitution of the United States guarantees, Judge Furman in his opinion answered the question in the following forceful manner:

I desire, without reading, to have it incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A careful consideration of this matter will show that the contention of counsel for appellees is not tenable. It must be conceded that the legislature has the right and power to make reasonable classifications with reference to any proper subject of legislation. The assumption of counsel for appellees is that the rights of capital are equal to the rights of labor. Good morals do not sustain this assumption. While labor and capital are both entitled to the protection of the law, it is not true that the abstract rights of capital are equal to those of labor, and that they both stand on an equal footing before the law. Labor is natural; capital is artificial. Labor was made by God; capital is made by man. Labor is not only blood and bone, but it also has a mind and a soul, and is animated by sympathy, hope, and love; capital is inanimate, soulless matter. Labor is the creator; capital is the creature. But if we concede that the assumption of counsel for appellees is well founded and if we arbitrarily and in disregard of good morals place capital and labor upon an absolute equality before the law, another difficulty confronts them. Capital organizes to accomplish its purposes. Then, according to their own logic, it would be a denial of equal rights to labor to deny to it the right to organize and act without a breach of the peace to meet the aggressions of capital.

We therefore hold, from either view, that the provisions of the statute constitute a reasonable classification, such as the legislature had the right to make, and that the antitrust law does not, on this account, violate the clause of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees equal protection to all of the citizens of the United States. We deny that trusts and monopolies are entitled to protection as citizens of the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. Whether the original decision against labor in the Buck's Stove case was correct or not, it is perfectly clear that we have a legal right to exempt labor from the operation of this law. That it is desirable to do so, few will deny. Labor is not property any more than the air we breathe. That it is necessary to organize to preserve the rights of labor can not be successfully denied. Without organization labor would be completely crushed by capital.

Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, when before the House committee, summed up his argument most convincingly in the following language:

Our existence is justified not only by our history, but our existence is legally the best concept of what constitutes law. It is an outrage—it is an outrage of not only the conscience, it is not only an outrage upon justice, it is an outrage upon our language to attempt to place in the same category a combination of men engaged in the speculation and the control of the products of labor and the products of the soil, on the one hand, and the associations of men and women who own nothing but themselves and undertake to control nothing but themselves and their power to work.

In another address to Congress on this same subject Mr. Gompers said:

That which we seek is not class legislation. It is a common custom in speaking to couple together the words "labor" and "capital" as though they stood for things of similar natures. Capital stands for material, tangible things, things separate and distinct from personality; labor is a human attribute indissolubly bound up with the human body. It is that by which man expresses the thought, the purpose, the self that is his own individuality; if he is a free man, he has the right to control this means of self-expression. This he values above all, for if he lose this right to decide the granting or withholding of his own labor, then freedom ceases and slavery begins. * * * Labor power is not a product; it is human ability to produce. Because of its very nature it can not be regarded as a trust or a corporation formed in restraint of trade. Any legislation or court construction dealing with the subject of organizations, corporations, or trusts which curtail or corner the products of labor can have no true application to the association of free men in the disposition or withholding of their labor power.

If it was a surprise when labor organizations were included in the terms of the antitrust law by the courts, it was certainly a greater astonishment when farmer organizations were also included. There seems, however, to have been but one prosecution of organizations of this kind that ever reached the higher courts, and it seems also to have been one of the very few proceedings directly under the criminal section of the Sherman Act in any case. It is certainly a little strange that with all of the every-day violations of the antitrust laws by trust magnates in every section of the country that the poor farmers and laborers should have been selected as the only men to make an example of in cases of this character by criminal prosecution. I have always believed that if the men who sat at their desks in their offices in Wall Street in 1899 and deliberately planned and formed the Standard Oil Co., with its $100,000,000 capital stock, taking over and practically wiping out of existence 400 independent oil companies throughout the United States, giving themselves the practical control of 90 per cent of the domestic and export trade in oil, and who also at the same time planned and formed the Amalgamated Copper Co., with its $175,000,000 capital stock, for the purpose of purchasing and operating all of the copper-producing properties of the country without engaging in the mining business at all, neither owning nor operating a single mine, but acting simply as a security holding corporation, with its assets consisting only of stocks of other operating corporations, and the officers and directors associated with them in the formation of these companies had all been proceeded against criminally, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary, it would have done more toward putting a stop to monopolistic organizations than all of the laws we could pass in 100 years. It would have simply "nipped in the bud" all the unlawful high-finance schemes invented by the financial pirates of this country which have caused so much trouble to the business world in the last few years.

During the first 17 years of operation of the Sherman antitrust law the only persons convicted and sentenced under the criminal section of that act were eight farmers of Grant County, Ky. Twelve prominent farmers of that county were charged with the crime of conspiracy in restraint of interstate trade and commerce, the action was dismissed against 1 and acquittal was had in 3 cases and the remaining 8 were convicted and severally sentenced to pay heavy fines. The case is entitled Steers against United States, and is reported in One hundred and ninety-second Federal Reporter, at page 1. A fair statement of the case is given by the defendant, J. G. Steers himself, as follows:

The facts in brief are these: In the fall of 1907 Mr. W. T. Osborn was solicited to pool his tobacco. He refused kindly but positively. Then he proposed and promised to R. L. Conrad and several others of our good men that he would hold his tobacco until the 1907 pool was sold. We believed him sincere and trusted him to hold his tobacco.

Some time in November, 1907, he prized the tobacco, and in the week of the 29th of November, 1907, he hauled it to the Dry Ridge depot and received a bill of lading for shipment to Cincinnati.

This tobacco was in depot several days, and on Thanksgiving Day, November 28, 1907, a meeting of our local was called; a general rumor seemed to be going the rounds that something might happen to this tobacco that night. I and many others made talks urging peace, law, and order, and some one suggested that a committee be sent to see Mr. Osborn, to see if he would yet hold his tobacco. Then his best friends were looked for, and J. S. Carter, a brother-in-law of Osborn, and A. C. Webb, a lifelong neighbor and friend, were made a committee to go at once and see what he would do.

A young man, Hugh Lee Conrad, furnished a rig and drove it, so the three—Conrad, Webb, and Carter—drove out to see him, and the rest of us waited at the lodge for their return. They reported a very pleasant, social meeting with Mr. Osborn; they told him what the general rumor was and he said, "He was already uneasy about it and thought he had made a mistake." He was asked to take it back home, but would not do it. Then they proposed he let them put it in some place and hold it here; to this he said, "No; I won't do that; but if you will haul it back to my barns I will let it lay there until you say for me to sell it." To this the committee agreed, and all separated as the best of friends. Osborn followed them to the road and thanked them and invited all back to see him.

The local received the news with rejoicing and all going home feeling very kindly toward Mr. Osborn. On the next morning 200 or 300 men, some on foot, some on horseback, and some in buggies, and four wagons met at the depot, loaded the four hogsheads of tobacco on four wagons and had a little parade and marched two by two toward Mr. Osborn's. The tobacco was delivered in good shape and a general good feeling, love feast, engaged in by all present. If there was a threat made by anyone I never heard it nor heard of it. We were unable to even locate the rumor. I called on the local to know if there was a man in the house who knew of anyone who would likely do violence or make any threats against Mr. Osborn or his tobacco, and I failed to find any, only several seemed to have heard the rumor, but could not tell where or from whom.

(Signed) J. G. STEERS.

This statement does not differ substantially from the statement of the case in the opinion of the court, except on the question of the threats against Osborn who had arranged to ship his tobacco, and defendants all claimed that there were no threats of any character made, and no force, coercion, or other unlawful means used or attempted by those who finally persuaded Osborn to hold on to his tobacco for a higher price. How these facts or circumstances could possibly amount to a violation of section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act is difficult to understand. In any event the conviction obtained under the facts in the case appealed so strongly to President Taft that he gave a full pardon to each of the defendants.

The Farmers' Union News of April 27, 1910, had this to say concerning the Kentucky convictions. I will ask leave to have it inserted as a part of my remarks without reading.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish the Senator would read that extract. It is very interesting and I should like to hear it read.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will be glad to read it.

THE KENTUCKY CONVICTIONS.

Eight of the eleven Kentuckians recently indicted by a United States grand jury have just been convicted in the United States district court and sentenced to pay fines ranging from $100 to $1,000. These eight were convicted under what is called the penal section of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890. They were convicted of "restraining interstate commerce." That is the heinous offense. The facts are simply these: Two or three years ago these men, who are excellent citizens of Grant County, Ky., and who stand high in the good opinions of their neighbors, persuaded one of their neighbors to haul his white-leaf tobacco back from the railroad station where he had taken it and had consigned it to a commission broker in Cincinnati, Ohio, just across the State line. For merely persuading a fellow friend and neighbor into withdrawing his products from the railroad's custody, which the shipper, the neighbor, had a perfect legal right to do, and where he had taken it and consigned it to a point in another State under the mistaken notion that the planters were no longer holding their tobacco, these eight men have been indicted and convicted of a crime. If the tobacco had been consigned to any town or city in Kentucky, the indictment and convictions could not have been, under the Sherman Act, which deals only with interstate and foreign commerce. What do you think of that? Much has been said on the Fourth of July and other patriotic occasions about this being a free country and about the inalienable rights of freedom of speech and the precious liberties we all enjoy in free America. But, Mr. Farmer, although the big trusts and monopolies have been allowed to run at large plotting, planning, and skinning you, both coming and going, the minute you get together or even talk of getting together in order to have some say about what you will take for your products or tell some friend he ought to hold his farm products, if they happen to have been consigned to a railroad company for shipment out of the State, you can be indicted and convicted of a crime under the Sherman Antitrust Act, which everybody knows was never intended to be used against anything or anyone except the big, thieving, robbing, oppressive monopolies and trusts. What is the matter with having Congress repeal that atrocious act, so ineffective against the trusts, and so outrageously unjust, and to our mind such an infringement of our liberties, both constitutionally and unconstitutionally?

Although the antitrust act was passed for the purpose of destroying trusts and the punishment of their promoters and others engaged in monopoly, it being clearly understood by the Members of Congress at the time of the passage of the act that it was not meant to apply and could not possibly be construed by anyone as applying to organizations of farmers or laboring men, yet farmers' societies and members of labor unions were the only persons indicted and convicted, all the big trust magnates being permitted to go their way and not a single one indicted until 1912 when the Cash Register people were convicted and sentenced. The conviction of the eight Kentucky farmers, the leading citizens of their community, is an illustration of the way the administration of the laws through the courts is sometimes used in a manner not anticipated, where the laws are turned against the supposed beneficiaries by those at whom the legislation was originally aimed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understood the Senator to say—and I have listened to his address—that up to this time the first convictions or the only convictions had under the Sherman antitrust law were against combinations of either laborers or farmers?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. SHAFROTH. To what time?

Mr. THOMPSON. Up to 1907.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Thank you.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Kansas is making a most interesting and learned discussion on a very important feature of the pending measure. I want to call attention to the fact that, with the single exception of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], sitting on this side of the Chamber, every seat upon the other side is vacant, and that three Senators upon the other side are engaged in a very earnest social or business discussion in one of the corners of the room.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope it is not my speech that caused them to leave the Chamber. I notice it is a common practice indulged in by the other side whenever any Democrat speaks. So I do not feel at all slighted.

Mr. President, with the organization of the Consolidated Tobacco Co., in 1901, with its capital stock of over $500,000,000, acquiring or wiping out of existence about 150 concerns, the price of the finished manufactured product sold by the trust went soaring upward, and the price of the new unmanufactured tobacco raised and sold by the farmers to the trust went rapidly downward. The raw product of the farmers continued to go down to such a low point that there was not a decent living in its production for the Kentucky and other southern tobacco growers who, through dire necessity, were compelled to get together in a lawful organization to protect themselves against the unlawful acts of the Tobacco Trust. The trust had to have this white burley tobacco to use in the manufacture of certain proprietary brands. The white burley leaf was grown only in limited area in central Kentucky. The trust was obliged to send its officials to bargain with a committee representing practically all of the tobacco growers instead of sending its agents to the individual growers, as it had theretofore done, to beat down the price by making all kinds of misrepresentations to compel the growers to accept whatever the trust offered. Consequently the price of raw tobacco gradually went up.

The tobacco growers became contented and prosperous. They thought the problem had been solved and that they were getting their just share for the product of their own toil. In the meantime the managers of the Tobacco Trust were watching for an opportunity to prosecute the growers under the Sherman Antitrust Act. This chance finally came when a single grower, Mr. W. T. Osborn, and his two tenants, of Grant County, Ky., although not members of the farmers' organization known as the Society of Equity, or the Burley Society, which had pooled and was holding at its warehouse all the tobacco of its members until they could get a higher price, thinking the growers were selling, took their tobacco to the railroad station at Dry Ridge and consigned it to a commission firm just across the river in Ohio But upon being told by several members of the farmers' society that they were not selling yet finally joined them by canceling the sale and hauling the tobacco back home. These eight men, who resorted simply to the right of "free speech," were indicted and convicted of the crime of conspiring to restrain interstate trade and commerce. At the same time the big trusts, such as the Standard Oil, Tobacco Trust, and other trusts, which were being proceeded against in the courts, and although found guilty were merely called into court and told to dissolve, and no attempt whatever was made under section 6 of the act to forfeit their property engaged in interstate commerce. No wonder President Taft pardoned all of the farmers convicted in the prosecution against them.

They had simply peaceably agreed to hold their crop until they could get a higher price—a price sufficient to reasonably compensate them for their labor. There could certainly be nothing wrong in this, any more than if we Senators were all wheat growers and would agree among ourselves to hold our crop until we could get $1 per bushel. I formerly knew an old successful farmer who always held his crops, and encouraged his neighbors to do likewise, until he received at least 30 cents per bushel for his corn and at least 50 cents per bushel for his wheat. He figured that he had to receive this price in order to get back the cost of growing, with a fair profit for his time and labor. This farmer lived to be nearly a hundred years old, and was worth a round $100,000 when he died, showing an average of $1,000 savings for every year of his life. This was only common-sense business prudence, and no one ever imagined that he was in any way violating the antitrust law.

Farming in this country is one of the most honorable and useful occupations in which our citizens can engage. Daniel Webster said concerning farmers:

> The farmers are the founders of human civilization. Not only that, they are the lasting foundation. Let us never forget that the cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of man. Unstable is the future of a country which has lost its taste for agriculture. If there is one lesson of history that is unmistakable, it is that national strength lies very near the soil.

Although farmers are perhaps imposed upon more than any other class of citizens, they are the most law-abiding and patriotic people of the country. They perform the most important duties required for the highest type of citizenship. We could go longer without the followers of any other occupation much easier than without the farmer Farmers are the real producers of the country, and without them the entire populace would eventually starve. They receive less for the value of their toil than any other laborers. They pay more taxes in proportion to the benefits received than any other citizen. They are therefore entitled to the highest protection of the law and of every reasonable favor in exemption that can legally and properly be extended to them in legislation or otherwise. This exemption from prosecution for associating together to protect themselves in order to secure just compensation for their products is certainly right and clearly legal for the reasons already stated. Organized labor and the farmer are seeking only legislative relief that they may not be prohibited from doing the things "not in themselves unlawful." That there is demand for this legislation is clearly shown by the action of the national meeting of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, which was held in my State at Salina last September, and adopted the following resolution.

I ask that the resolution be made a part of my remarks without reading.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope the Senator will read it. I am very much interested in his address, and I would like to hear the resolution read.

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well. I will gladly read it.

> Whereas according to the debates and statements made by Senators and Congressmen in charge of the bill on the floor of Congress in 1888 to 1890 it was never intended that the Sherman Antitrust Act should apply to aggregations of individuals, but only to aggregations of capital engineered by a few big speculators seeking unreasonable prices and profits; and
> Whereas during the first 17 years of the act the only convictions under the criminal section were farmers, promptly pardoned as a plain miscarriage of justice, the courts misinterpreting and misconstruing the act even to the extent of judicially legislating the word "unreasonable" into the law, wrongfully holding that trade meant traders, and that any interference with trade when done by farmers or by any persons, except, apparently, the big trust magnates, was criminal restraint of trade: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America commend the action of Congress in limiting the $300,000 appropriation to the aggressive enforcement of the act and the real objects of the legislation, namely, the big trusts, and urge the importance of legislation that will correct the judicial legislation of the courts which have wrongfully decided that it means things Congress never intended and the people never expected and the construction placed upon the said law by the former and present President of the United States.

This farmers' organization is composed of over 3,000,000 farmers, completely organized in 21 States of the Union and with auxilliary local organizations in 11 other States.

The Democratic platform in 1908, repeated in 1912, on this important question, declared as follows:

> The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

President Wilson in his speech of acceptance of the presidential nomination spoke concerning working men as follows:

> The working people of America—if they must be distinguished from the minority that constitutes the rest of it—are, of course, the backbone of the Nation No law that safeguards their life, that improves the physical and moral conditions under which they live, that makes their (the working people of America) hours of labor rational and tolerable, that gives them freedom to act in their own interests, and that protects them where they can not protect themselves can properly be regarded as class legislation or as anything but a measure taken in the interest of the whole people, whose partnership in right action we are trying to establish and make real and practical. It is in this spirit that we shall act if we are genuine spokesmen of the whole country.

Therefore, the exemption of the farmer and labor organizations as contemplated in this act, being right, legal, and clearly in accordance with the Democratic policy on this subject, I hope that the proposed legislation will be enacted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has examined into the statistics as to the number of antitrust indictments that have been made against labor organizations and farmers' organizations, and also whether he has examined as to how many indictments have been found among the large business people against those who combined for interference with interstate commerce?

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will permit me I will state that upon an examination recently made by myself I find that the Sherman antitrust law has been brought into requisition in 101 cases against farmers' and labor organizations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many against the big trusts?

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure that the same zeal that was used against the farmers' and laborers' organizations has never been exercised and used against the trusts.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will say for the information of the Senator from Colorado that I think there is a list published and it is furnished by the document room. My attention was called to it. I did not take the pains to count them to ascertain just how many; but I did look through it hurriedly to find that the first criminal prosecution of any sort was against farmers under the criminal section of the statute.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will gladly yield.

Mr. JONES. I desire to get the views of the Senator from Kansas as to how far he thinks this provision of the proposed law goes. Does it go any further than recognizing the legality of these organizations as organizations, or does it permit these organizations, after they are organized, to then go on and do things in restraint of trade and exempt them from prosecution for such acts?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it exempts them simply as lawful organizations; but, of course, if they do anything unlawful or use any unlawful means, they are subject to prosecution under the antitrust law and under the general laws on the subject without regard to the antitrust law.

Mr. JONES. That is what I wanted to get at; that is about my idea with reference to how far this provision goes.

Mr. THOMPSON. The provision only protects such organizations in the performance of lawful acts, as I understand.

Mr. JONES. It prevents the court from holding as a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman law simply because of their organization?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is the intention, as I understand.

Mr. JONES. As I understand, that is the Senator's idea as to the extent to which this provision goes?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. I saw a statement purporting to come from the President that this provision, in effect, simply recognizes as lawful what many of the courts already hold is legal, and does not go any further; and, as I understand, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the other House gave out a statement to the press in which he held the same view; in other words, as the Senator understands, this provision does not really exempt any of these organizations from prosecution for the commission of acts which would, in fact, be in restraint of trade, and therefore prohibited by the Sherman antitrust law, but it does recognize their right to exist as organizations; the mere fact that they are organizations does not warrant any prosecution against them?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; nor for performing lawful acts in connection with the purposes of the organization.

Mr. JONES. Of course, they could not be prosecuted for performing lawful acts.

Mr. THOMPSON. Withholding crops for higher prices, refusing to work for certain wages, and acts of that character would not be unlawful; nor could you prosecute them for the mere fact that they are organized to protect themselves any more than you could prosecute the Masons or Odd Fellows or any other secret society by reason of their organization for the common good of all their members.

Mr. JONES. I merely wanted to get the Senator's idea. That was and is my idea as to what this section means.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, out of consideration for the Senate, as well as for myself, it is not my purpose to deliver any extended remarks on this measure; but I desire to invite the attention of the Senate briefly to the general outlines of the bill.

As is well known to the Senate, four general legislative purposes are sought to be accomplished by the bill under consideration:

First. It is proposed, without amending the Sherman Antitrust Act, approved July 2, 1890, to supplement that act by denouncing and making unlawful certain trade practices which, while not covered by that act because not amounting to restraint of commerce or monopoly in themselves, yet constitute elements tending ultimately to violations of that act. The trade practices made illegal by the bill are discrimination in prices for the purpose of unlawfully injuring or destroying the business of competitors, exclusive and tying contracts, holding companies, and interlocking directorates.

Second. It is proposed by the bill to further supplement existing antitrust acts by a provision that whenever a corporation shall violate the antitrust laws such violation shall be deemed as that also of the individual directors and officers who shall have authorized or participated in the acts constituting such violation, thereby establishing the personal guilt of the officials of the corporation who are really responsible for its illegal conduct.

Third. Following the original purpose of the framers of the Sherman antitrust law, the bill proposes expressly to exempt labor, agricultural, horticultural, and other organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws.

Fourth. The bill seeks to regulate the issuance of temporary restraining orders and injunctions generally by the courts of the United States, and particularly in labor controversies, and to make provision for the trial by jury in contempts which are committed beyond the presence of the court.

Many amendments to the bill are proposed by the committee, but the general scope of the bill is not altered by these amendments. While the amendments do not propose to depart from the general object of the bill, yet in some instances the form of the substantive law, as well as the remedies provided for its enforcement, are proposed to be changed. In sections 2 and 4, which deal with price discriminations and exclusive and tying contracts, respectively, instead of providing that the acts named shall constitute offenses punishable by fine and imprisonment, as in the House bill, the proposed amendments declare the acts unlawful and provide for the general enforcement of the sections through the agency of the Federal trade commission, the creation of which is provided for in a bill which recently passed the Senate and is now in conference. In sections 8 and 9, which deal with holding companies and interlocking directorates, respectively, some changes have been made in the provisions of positive law, and the general enforcement of the sections has been confided by the amendments to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of common carriers and to the Federal trade commission in the case of individuals, partnerships, and industrial corporations.

The pertinency and effect of the other amendments proposed by the committee will appear as we proceed with their consideration. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read for the consideration of the committee amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. CULBERSON. The formal reading has been had. The bill has been read at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the reading of the bill is commenced I wish to say that I have no knowledge whatever as to how many Senators on this side of the Chamber desire to debate the bill. I think it likely, however, that many of them are not aware of the fact that the bill is now being taken up for amendment. Therefore, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON. The bill has been read in full, on the insistence, in part, of the Senator from New Hampshire himself.

Mr. GALLINGER. I so understand; but my remark was that I apprehended that Senators did not know that the bill was being taken up for the consideration of amendments, and I think more of them ought to be in the Chamber. So I ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	James	Owen	Stone
Burton	Jones	Poindexter	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Chilton	Lane	Ransdell	Thornton
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Culberson	McCumber	Shafroth	Walsh
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	White
Gallinger	Nelson	Shively	Williams
Gore	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There not being a quorum present, the Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BRISTOW and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. CAMDEN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Carolina that there is a standing order to that effect.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. LEE of Maryland, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. LEWIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Texas if he will permit me to make a brief statement?

Mr. CULBERSON. With reference to this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Just a word—more particularly with reference to my having called for a quorum.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Senator from Texas was proceeding to ask that the bill should be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee should be first considered, there were only a few Senators in the Chamber, and I thought it but fair that Senators should have an opportunity to be present. I want the Senator to know that I did not call for a quorum for the purpose of delay at all. I do not expect to say a word on this bill, and I hope it will be speedily considered; and it is likely I shall not again call for a quorum; but I thought that the Senators perhaps were not aware of the fact that the bill was being considered, and as 60 Senators had answered to their names a little while ago, I thought we would secure a quorum speedily, and that the call would not create much delay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, page 2, line 17, after the name "United States," to insert, "Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall apply to the Philippine Islands," so as to make the clause read:

"Commerce," as used herein, means trade or commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State, Territory, or foreign nation, or between any insular possessions or other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, or between any such possession or place and any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or any foreign nation, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall apply to the Philippine Islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, when the Committee on the Judiciary made their report on this bill, they proposed a number of amendments to section 2. Since then the Federal trade commission bill has passed the Senate and is now in conference. Under that bill all questions affecting unfair competition are to be submitted to that tribunal. I am now authorized by the committee to abandon the amendments to section 2, and to move in lieu thereof that the entire section 2 be stricken out, for the reason that the general subject embraced in that section can be dealt with by the Federal trade commission, as provided for in the trade commission bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to strike out section 2.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 3, after line 24, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for the owner, operator, or transporter of the product or products of any mine, oil or gas well, reduction works, refinery, or hydroelectric plant producing coal, oil, gas, or hydroelectric energy, or for any person controlling the products thereof, engaged in selling such product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and any person violating this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished as provided in the preceding section.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to know why that section is proposed to be stricken out. It is a provision of the House bill and affects certain enumerated products. I should like to know whether there is any special reason why those products should not be brought under the terms of this bill.

If we strike out that section, it would seem to permit a dealer in the products enumerated to refuse arbitrarily to sell to anyone.

Mr. CULBERSON. If we strike out the section, the question is left open like all other sales questions are left open for the parties. I will read the reasons given in the committee report recommending that section 3 be stricken out. They are as follows:

The proposed Senate amendment is to strike out this section altogether, because, in the opinion of the committee, it would be unwise to enact such legislation as is contained in it. It would, primarily, deny freedom of contract to one of the parties, and consequently would be of doubtful constitutional validity. Passing from this consideration, the committee believe that such an enactment, which would practically compel owners of the products named to sell to anyone or else decline to do so at the peril of incurring heavy penalties, would project us into a field of legislation at once untried, complicated, and dangerous.

Those are the reasons which impelled the committee to recommend that section 3 be stricken out.

Mr. JONES. Was the committee unanimous in that conclusion?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee to strike out section 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. What I said a moment ago, Mr. President, with reference to section 2, applies with equal force to section 4. That is one of the matters pertaining to unfair competition, and as that general subject has been treated in the bill which has passed the Senate and is now in conference, the committee, instead of recommending the amendments to the section, withdraw those proposed amendments and suggest that the entire section 4 be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to strike out section 4.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, before we proceed to the next committee amendment I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is his judgment that section 5 would apply to violations of the trade commission bill when it shall become a law?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not think it will.

Mr. JONES. The Senator does not think that that act will constitute one of the antitrust laws within the meaning of section 5?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that would depend entirely on whether the definition of the antitrust laws remains as it is in the trade commission bill. If that definition is broadened so as to include the trade commission bill as one of the antitust laws, then this section would cover any violation of that law.

Mr. CULBERSON. This bill itself does not provide that the trade commission bill, when it finally becomes a law, shall be included within the antitrust laws as named in this bill, nor does the Federal trade commission bill so provide, as I remember.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 12, after the words "Sec. 6," to strike out:

That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States under any of the antitrust laws there shall have been rendered a final judgment or decree to the effect that a defendant has entered into a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce, or has monopolized, or attempted to monopolize or combined with any person or persons to monopolize, any part of commerce, in violation of any of the antitrust laws, said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity is hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States, under any of the antitrust laws, the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under such antitrust laws and based, in whole or in part, on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding in equity shall be suspended during the pendency of such suit or proceeding in equity.

And to insert:

That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Any person may be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense under the antitrust laws, and any suit arising under those laws may be maintained if the indictment is found or the suit is brought within six years next after the occurrence of the act or cause of action complained of, any statute of limitation or other provision of law heretofore enacted to the contrary notwithstanding. Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity is instituted by the United States to prevent or restrain violations of any of the antitrust laws the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof: Provided, That this shall not be held to extend the statute of limitations in the case of offenses heretofore committed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest that, after the word "equity," on line 13, page 6, there should be inserted the words "now pending or hereafter," so that it would read:

That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity now pending or hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States—

And so forth.

It seems to me the public should have the benefit of the provisions of the proposed amendment both as to suits that are now pending, and which have not proceeded as far as judgment or decree, and as to those which may be brought after the bill becomes a law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not considered the constitutional phase of the matter very carefully, but as I look at it the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado would be a limitation upon the amendment rather than an enlargement of it. As I understand this section, it applies to all decrees heretofore rendered as well as to decrees hereafter rendered, and makes those decrees prima facie evidence in suits brought by individuals for the recovery of damages.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator is correct, then, of course, my amendment would be a limitation, but I do not so understand the phraseology of the amendment. Generally speaking, I think it may be said that the presumption is against the retroactive character of legislation. There must be something in express terms to make it retroactive.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest——

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest, if the Senator will pardon me, that perhaps in the amendment, instead of using the words "now pending or hereafter," we might use the words "heretofore or hereafter," so that it would read:

That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity heretofore or hereafter brought—

And so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand, this section is prospective so far as it relates to suits brought by individuals; that is, suits that may be hereafter brought. That would be, I think, the construction given by the courts.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; it is for the benefit of individual litigants hereafter.

Mr. CUMMINS. But when the suit is brought, then the judgment or decree of the court in the suit that has been brought by the Government would be prima facie evidence of violation of the antitrust law, no matter whether that decree is rendered hereafter or whether it has already been rendered; and I see no constitutional objection to making it so. In other words, it is simply a rule of evidence.

Mr. THOMAS. There might be, Mr. President, constitutional objection to making a judgment prima facie evidence in some suit thereafter brought when the judgment was rendered prior to the enactment of the law. There could be none with reference to pending cases in which judgment would be subsequently rendered. Of course, I do not mean to say that there is a constitutional objection in either case, but I think there is an ambiguity here——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. Just one moment. I think there is an ambiguity here to which the principle that legislation will not be presumed to be retroactive would apply if we do not make it clear.

I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say to the Senator that I think he is decidedly right. The general rule of construction about statutes of this kind is that unless it expressly otherwise appears from the phraseology of the statute it has no retroactive effect; it applies only to future cases. I do not think this provision in lines 12, 13, 14, and so on, applies to anything except future cases as the language stands now.

Mr. THOMAS. Inasmuch as there is room for difference of opinion, which is quite evident, I think it should be amended so that it will read:

That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity heretofore or hereafter brought.

So that there could be no question about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. "Heretofore brought or now pending or hereafter brought."

Mr. THOMAS. My first amendment was "now pending or hereafter brought," and the Senator objected to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unless there is a constitutional objection I should be very sorry to see it limited to decrees or judgments rendered in cases pending or hereafter brought.

Mr. THOMAS. Then the word "heretofore" would answer the purpose the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. For instance, take the decree in the American Tobacco case or the Standard Oil case. Suppose a person injured by either of those companies should bring suit to recover damages. I see no reason why the decree already rendered against those companies should not be made prima facie evidence in favor of the individual who brings the suit for damages.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to that, Mr. President, but I think the amendment is necessary in order that the purpose which the Senator has in mind may be certainly and effectively carried out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am rather inclined to agree with that.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will read from the syllabus in the case of Union Pacific Railroad Co. versus Laramie Stockyards Co., in Two hundred and thirty-first United States:

The first rule of construction of statutes is that legislation is addressed to the future and not to the past. This rule is one of obvious justice.

So I suggest that if we amend this language in any respect we ought to insert the word "hereafter" instead of the word "heretofore," because the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States is, as suggested by the syllabus I have just read, that it is a rule of obvious justice that statutes shall only act prospectively and not retroactively.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not agree that it is universal law that there can be no retroactive effect of a statute without coming into collision with the Constitution. A great many of our statutes are retroactive; but it would not be a retroactive statute in this case to make a judgment heretofore rendered, assuming that we have the right to deal with it in that manner, prima facie evidence in a suit hereafter brought. It is prospective in regard to the suits in which the judgment shall be evidence, and is not retroactive in the sense of the suggestion made by the Supreme Court in the case just cited. There is no difference in principle between making a judgment already rendered between third parties prima facie evidence in another suit and doing the same thing as to judgments hereafter rendered. The person who is to be affected can not be admitted as a party in any suit hereafter brought nor to any decree hereafter rendered, so that the principle of the rule is just the same in either case.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the rule as announced by the Supreme Court in the case cited by the Senator from Texas is the universal rule, and it is, as there stated, an obviously just one, but it does not apply to statutes which in terms take effect prior to the time of their enactment. There are many State constitutions which forbid retroactive legislation of any sort. The Federal Constitution forbids Congress from enacting any ex post facto law, which, of course, has a technical meaning, and is applied to criminal statutes.

I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa that a decision favorable to the Government, rendered in a case brought by the United States against violators of the antitrust acts, should be prima facie evidence in actions brought by individuals against the same concern to recover damages which they have suffered from that violation or any other of similar character; but there are a great many cases pending in which, if this obvious construction be given to the statute as the amendment is phrased as reported here to the Senate, the litigants interested would be excluded from the prima facie effect which this statute gives to judgments rendered in cases brought after the bill shall become law.

Personally, I see no room for distinction, in justice and fairness, between the application of this principle in the Tobacco case or the Standard Oil case or any other case which has heretofore gone to judgment, as regards litigants bringing suit under this bill after its enactment, and its application to judgments rendered under suits brought by the Government after its enactment. The decision to which the Senator has referred makes the amendment which I suggest absolutely necessary, unless the Senate intends that it shall be only prospective in its operation.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the application of the decision read by the Senator from Texas does not depend upon the meaning of the word "rendered"?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I think not.

Mr. CHILTON. The provision reads:

That a final judgment or decree rendered in any suit or proceeding.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I think the word "brought" controls.

Mr. CHILTON. Does not that mean a decree or judgment hereafter rendered?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I think the word "brought" in this sentence, when the principle of the decision in Two hundred and thirty-first United States is applied to the amendment, would have that effect and would have reference to suits brought by the Government subsequently to the enactment of the law.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I can hardly agree with the Senator. This language refers to judgments or decrees rendered in any suit. Under the well-settled principle read by the Senator from Texas, of course, the word "rendered" there would be construed prospectively—that is, it would be held to apply to decrees hereafter rendered. I understand that is the meaning of the decision read by the Senator from Texas, and I take it that if we want it to mean something else it will have to be amended.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice that on page 5, in the provision which we strike out and propose to amend in this respect, the House uses the word "hereafter" before the word "brought"; and I think it means the same as the Senate amendment in that respect.

Mr. CHILTON. I think, though, our attention should be centered upon when the decree was rendered. When the suit was brought makes no difference. The fact that the suit was brought 10 years ago, and has not yet reached judgment or decree, would make no difference. This is purely a matter of evidence.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the suit should be brought hereafter, the judgment could not be rendered prior to that, of course.

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly not; and that only emphasizes what I am saying. We are legislating as to certain decrees rendered. Now, under the law that means decrees hereafter rendered, and it makes no difference when the suit is brought. It is purely making it a matter of evidence, which is within our power, and I take it that under this language it means decrees hereafter rendered. I should think there would be no doubt about that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am disposed to agree with the construction which the Senator from West Virginia places upon that language, but would it not avoid all uncertainty to insert the word "hereafter"?

Mr. CHILTON. It depends upon what is the judgment of the Senate. As the language is now, it is perfectly clear that it has a prospective meaning, and it refers to judgments and decrees hereafter rendered. It depends upon what is the judgment of the Senate finally as to what it wants. I am speaking of the language used.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, referring to the remark made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. CULBERSON], I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the word "hereafter" is quite appropriate in the House provision, which proceeds upon an entirely different basis. The House provision makes the judgment rendered conclusive of the facts and the law therein determined. Of course you could not make a judgment rendered in the past conclusive when it was not at the time it was rendered; and therefore, to give any force or effect at all to the House provision, you must have the word "hereafter" there. Indeed if the word "hereafter" were not in the House provision, the courts would so construe it anyway. It is, however, entirely unnecessary in order to give validity to the provision made by the Senate committee, because the Senate committee's amendment makes the judgment simply prima facie evidence; and the principle is thoroughly well established that you can declare a judgment rendered in the past to be prima facie evidence in the future, but you can not, as a matter of course, make it conclusive.

Mr. President, now that this matter has been precipitated, I desire to say that when this Senate amendment shall have been perfected it is my purpose to ask the Senate to reject the amendment and to stand upon the House provision; and if the Senate will bear with me a little while I desire to speak about that matter now.

The essential difference between the House provision and the Senate amendment is that under the House provision all judgments rendered in antitrust cases are made conclusive, both as to the facts and as to the law, in any action thereafter brought by a private individual against the corporation adjudged to have offended against the antitrust law, while the Senate provision makes the judgment simply prima facie evidence of the facts therein determined.

The operation of the thing is this: If the United States shall proceed against any organization said to be a combination in violation of the Sherman Act, and eventually, after a judicial proceeding going through all the courts, it shall be determined and decided that the organization is a combination in violation of the Sherman Act, that judgment stands and can be availed of by anybody who claims to have been damaged by reason of the existence of the combination. The party seeking to take advantage of it will not be obliged to travel again, step by step, over the entire field which the Government has been obliged to traverse in order to reach the judgment at which it arrived; but he will start in where the Government left off, the judgment being conclusive, establishing the facts and the law so far as it goes, and allowing him simply to establish and putting upon him the burden of establishing the actual damages which he has suffered. In other words, we give to the private individual the benefit which accrues by reason of the long litigation pursued by the Government in endeavoring to secure the judgment.

The amendment proposed by the Senate committee, however, simply makes that judgment prima facie evidence, so that when the individual citizen, claiming to be damnified by reason of the organization thus adjudged to be in violation of law brings his action to recover damages, he may submit in evidence the judgment and then prove his damages; but, although that will make a case for him, the organization still has a right to submit other evidence, to have a further trial upon the matter, and eventually to get a judgment overturning, if it can, the judgment that was rendered in the action brought by the United States Government.

What does that mean? That means that every private individual seeking to recover damages must go into court recognizing that he will be obliged to meet any additional evidence that the outlawed corporation may be able to command in order to arrive at a different result in the proceedings, and, as a matter of course, he must make his own provision in order to meet that testimony. We all know that the private individual is always at a disadvantage. He is never armed with the means at his command to cope with these great organizations; and that was the very reason why this act was passed—in order that the Government, with its great powers, might meet on something like equal terms the great aggregations of capital against which the statute was leveled.

I may say here—and I think I violate no confidence in saying it—that the force of these suggestions appealed powerfully to every member of the Judiciary Committee; and I believe that were it not for the fact that most of those members believed that the House provision violated constitutional principles the amendment suggested never would have been proposed at all.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. On the point to which the Senator has just alluded, if he will permit me, I will read him a sentence or two from the report of the committee:

> The material difference between the House provision and the Senate amendment is, of course, whether the decree in favor of the Government shall be prima facie evidence against the same defendant in a subsequent suit by another party or be conclusive against such defendant. The committee think there are considerations of public policy which favor the House provision of conclusiveness; but in the state of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in kindred cases they believe the law should go no further than to make the decree prima facie evidence.

Mr. WALSH. I am very glad the Senator has called the attention of the Senate to the report of the committee confirmatory of the suggestions I have been making, and I believe the wisdom of the policy of the House provision will address itself, upon the very slightest consideration, to every Member of this body. So it becomes simply a question whether we may, consistently with the provisions of the Constitution, make a judgment rendered in an action brought by the Government of the United States conclusive in subsequent proceedings brought by a private individual to recover damages sustained by him in consequence of the conduct of the defendant in the Government's suit. With all deference to the opinions of my colleagues upon the Judiciary Committee—and I speak with entire respect—I say that I am unable to understand the argument which would condemn an act of that character as in violation of the Constitution.

Why, Mr. President, the defendant, the violating corporation, has had its day in court. It has had an opportunity to try out before a court, with all the forms of the law, every question involved in the lawsuit. It has tried them, and all of the issues have been determined against it. I ask, Mr. President, upon what principles of constitutional law can it rely for justification of a second trial of these very same issues?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Suppose the Senator from Montana were a defendant in a suit brought by the Senator from Nebraska, who prevailed in the action, obtaining a judgment against the Senator from Montana. Subsequently I bring an action growing out of the same transaction. Does the Senator believe that a statute making the judgment of the Senator from Nebraska against the Senator from Montana conclusive in the action which I brought would be constitutional?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not myself perceive any distinction between the case supposed and that of a suit brought by the Government against an offending corporation.

Mr. WALSH. I think I can demonstrate it very readily. I was going to try to do so.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has asked me whether a judgment taken by him against the Senator from Nebraska could be made conclusive in a subsequent action which he brought against me involving exactly the same facts.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; the Senator is slightly in error in his statement. I supposed a case brought by the Senator from Nebraska against the Senator from Montana resulting in final judgment. I then supposed a case brought by myself against the Senator from Montana growing out of the same transaction, and asked whether a statute making the former judgment conclusive against the Senator from Montana in the case brought by me would be constitutional. I understood the Senator to say "No." My further query was as to the difference between the case supposed and one brought by the Government against an offending corporation under the antitrust act.

Mr. WALSH. I am unable to perceive any difference between the condition of facts now stated by the Senator from Colorado and the condition of facts that I have stated. I will say that, depending upon the relations that subsist between the Senator from Nebraska and myself, a judgment against him might be very easily made conclusive against me.

In fact, Mr. President, there are many relations in life and in business under which a judgment taken against one man is made conclusive against another man, to which I desire to advert. A judgment taken against an agent is under many circumstances made conclusive against the principal. A judgment taken against one individual of a class is very often made conclusive against everyone belonging to the same class. A judgment taken against a city in a suit brought by a single taxpayer or a citizen of the city is often made conclusive in any proceeding subsequently brought by another citizen. Oftentimes an action is brought, for instance, by a citizen, a taxpayer, against the city and against parties said to be in collusion with the officers of the city in the transaction of certain business.

The judgment goes against that party adjudging that the proceeding was under the law and was warranted. That judgment becomes conclusive against any other citizen of the city desiring to prosecute the same character of action.

So, Mr. President, in all these antitrust prosecutions the Government of the United States prosecutes the action for the benefit of every one of its citizens. Otherwise there is no justification for the law at all. The Government of the United States sues in the action as parens patriæ, the father of all its children, and for their benefit. That is the relation which exists between the United States suing under one of these antitrust acts and all others of its citizens, and there is no reason at all why the judgment, so far as it goes, should not be made conclusive against a corporation when it is sued for damages to it resulting from the very acts complained of.

Mr. President, this is what might result under the existing state of the law or under the amendment proposed by the Senate committee. A judgment will have gone against the corporation adjudging it to be in existence in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. That lawsuit will have been fought out bitterly, desperately, through a long series of years at an enormous expense to both the litigants thereto, the contest being upon both the facts and the law, and judgment finally goes against the corporation. Then, Mr. President, you not only open up the matter and allow the corporation to put in additional evidence as against a private individual suing to recover his damages on account of the unlawful corporation, but legal principles are again opened up for determination, and in the action brought by the private individual, after harrying him clear through the courts to the court of last resort, you may find different legal principles even announced and principles that would have defeated the action in the first instance. In other words, unless you make this complete, it practically amounts to no assistance whatever to the man who desires to recover damages by reason of the combination adjudged to be unlawful.

Mr. President, in view of the relationship which exists between the Government upon the one hand and its citizens upon the other, I entertain no doubt whatever that when the law and the facts are tried out in the action brought by the Government on behalf of every one of its citizens, any one of them is entitled to have the benefit of that judgment, and to say these matters are all foreclosed and determined, and to insist that the only question which remains for consideration is the damages suffered by it.

Accordingly, I believe, Mr. President, that the House provision ought to remain in the bill, but, of course, if it does, you must leave the word "hereafter" there, because obviously the conclusive effect can not be given to judgments heretofore rendered.

Mr. HUGHES. Let me ask the Senator a question. I have heard only the latter part of the Senator's argument. It seemed to me that the provision of the Senate committee is quite an original departure from the House bill, and I wondered what the effect would be of striking out the word "hereafter." It seems to me that it would give a retroactive effect to past judgments and decrees.

Mr. WALSH. I stated to the Senate, in opening, that to my mind when the judgment is made only prima facie evidence that character can be given not only to judgments rendered in the future, but it may be equally attributed to judgments rendered in the past; but if you seek to give a conclusive character to it, it can of course only apply to judgments in the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Montana a question. He has raised a very interesting inquiry. I turn it around a little and put it in this way: Suppose the State of Montana were to institute a criminal proceeding against one of its citizens for larceny and a conviction followed, could the State make that conclusive evidence in a suit brought by the owner of the property against the defendant for recovery?

Mr. WALSH. I should say unhesitatingly that it could, and I was referring to a lot of those things by way of illustration.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not asserting now any opinion of my own about it, but I see that that might be a parallel instance. The Senator from Montana says that the judgment or conviction of the defendant could be made conclusive evidence against the defendant in a suit brought by the owner of the property for the recovery of its value.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see why it could not. Let me go on. Here is a man charged with the larceny of my horse. In order to establish the action it is necessary to prove that it was my horse and that the defendant took it and converted it to his own use. I make the complaint against him. I charge that it was my horse and that he feloniously took it and converted it to his own use. We go on and try that matter, and the jury is charged that they shall acquit him unless they believe that he wrongfully took my horse and converted it to his own use. I should like to understand upon what constitutional ground it can be said that when I go into a civil action to recover damages for the taking of that horse the defendant is entitled to have another jury trial of that issue.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, right there I should like to ask this question. Suppose that the act of larceny consisted of the felonious taking of a horse belonging to the Senator and another horse belonging to me, all in the same transaction. The Government proceeds by indictment against the defendant, including the horse of the Senator from Montana with my property in the indictment. Subsequently I bring suit for the recovery of the value of the horse taken from me. Could the conviction resulting from the indictment for the larceny of the horse of the Senator from Montana be made conclusive in the suit which I have instituted?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. The question of the taking of the horse of the Senator from Colorado was not in issue at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not the fact that a great many, if not all, the suits brought for damages would be analogous to that situation, involving the precise, substantial property in the first suit?

Mr. WALSH. The judgment in the antitrust case would be determinative of merely the issues raised in that case. They would be conclusive just so far as they were issues of law and issues of fact in that case and no further.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say that I am in hearty sympathy with the argument of the Senator from Montana, because I can perceive very easily—all of us can—the consequences of making this judgment prima facie instead of conclusive. The result would be precisely as the Senator has predicted. I am unable as yet to bring my mind in harmony with the Senator from Montana on the constitutional question.

Mr. WALSH. Let me go a little further, Mr. President, and offer some further illustrations. A man is charged with the malicious destruction of personal property belonging to A. A makes complaint and the man is proceeded against criminally. He is tried and is found guilty upon evidence convincing a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that he maliciously destroyed the property of A. Then A begins action to recover damages against him. What constitutional right of his is transgressed by a statute which would make the judgment in that criminal proceeding conclusive in the action brought to recover the damages?

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the Senator from Montana whether he knows of such legislation in the various States? It is a new subject with me.

Mr. WALSH. I will state that I searched very diligently and was unable to find any adjudication whatever upon the legal proposition which is here at issue between the House provision and the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. One more question. If the House provision limited its operation to suits in equity brought by the Government, does the Senator know why it was not extended to criminal prosecutions as well?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not. I was going to instance the case of a criminal libel. A newspaper publisher is indicted, charged with having published a criminal libel against A. A makes complaint and has him prosecuted criminally for publishing that libel. The question is whether he did publish it and whether it is libelous. He is adjudged to be guilty and is punished accordingly. Then A sues to recover damages by reason of the publication of that libel. Why in that civil action should he be called upon to do anything more than prove the actual damages, and upon what principle, under what provision of the Constitution can a man have a second trial of the very issues that were tried in the criminal case?

Instances of this kind might be multiplied. I must confess, Mr. President, that I am myself unable to find any satisfactory answer to them.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Senator whether the State could make a tax deed conclusive evidence as to the title of land?

Mr. WALSH. Many States have statutes making the deed conclusive evidence of every question, not going to the groundwork of the tax; that is to say, to the assessment and levy of the tax. It is held, I believe, that the tax deed can not be made conclusive evidence upon those questions.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, as the Senator from Montana has very properly said, there was no division in the Committee on the Judiciary upon the desirability of making these judgments and decrees obtained by the Government against trusts conclusive. So far as it was expressed there, everyone would like to have it so that these judgments and decrees should be available by anyone who might be injured by reason of the machinery and the machinations of the trusts, so that the burden of a new trial would not be put upon private individuals.

But, Mr. President, in our zeal to do something for the people and to get legislation which has "teeth in it" we must remember that every person under the Constitution of the United States has rights. One of the fundamental rights of every person and every corporation in the United States is that he must have a day in court, and he must have his day in court on his case and on his facts. For instance, if we would make a judgment conclusive as against a defendant it shocks any man's sense of justice and right to fail to make it conclusive as against a plaintiff. Certainly no Senator can stand here and argue the proposition that if A and B would have a lawsuit he would make the facts found and the judgment rendered conclusive as against B and not make it conclusive as against A. I do not care what might be the necessity nor what might be the condition; I do not care what might be the evil and what might be suggested to me as a remedy, I am unwilling to stand upon this floor and vote for something that means that a law is applicable to one party in a litigation and not applicable to another.

If we can make a decree conclusive as to those not parties, and would make this a just law, we should make it so that this decree shall be conclusive for all purposes as against the plaintiff and as against the defendant. If made conclusive, we should make it conclusive for all purposes and for both sides. If we want to enact just legislation, legislation that shows to the country that we are trying to be fair and right about this thing and not trying to yield to prejudice, we would enact that kind of legislation. If we would do otherwise, then we would be in an indefensible position. Here the great Beef Trust has recently been prosecuted. A verdict of acquittal was rendered for them. Shall we stand here and give life to a system of laws that would make that Beef Trust forever innocent under the laws of the United States? Certainly not. And yet we will enact just such a one-sided law unless we adopt the Senate amendment.

Mr. President, this is not a new question in the courts. It has been settled by the authorities, and the fundamental principle is that if you make anything evidence in a case, anything that has been properly adjudicated, you must preserve one principle, and that is a man must have his day in court, to submit to the court in his case any evidence that bears upon a matter that is essential to the judgment or decree which may be rendered. For instance, take the case supposed by the Senator from Montana. Here is a suit brought by A against B. It is concerning the same transaction as to which C has a suit against B. But, Mr. President, A and B may enter a collusive judgment, which should not bind C. The judgment against B may have been brought about by testimony that is conceded at the time of the trial between A and B to have been perjured, to have been false, and when C and B try their suit everybody in the courthouse, the judge and the jury and both parties to the litigation, might be willing to concede that every witness who testified against B testified falsely, and yet the House bill provides that C can not show it in his case. It is for that reason that the courts have said that they will never allow anything to be made conclusive in a suit between parties if it goes to the extent of precluding either of the parties from showing any facts that bear upon the issue.

On that proposition I want to read to the Senate some of the authorities. One of them is in Two hundred and nineteenth United States, the case of the Mobile Railroad against Turnipseed. I do not want to read all of it. I read from page 43, Two hundred and nineteenth United States:

> If a legislative provision not unreasonable in itself prescribing a rule of evidence, in either criminal or civil cases, does not shut out from the party affected a reasonable opportunity to submit to the jury in his defense all of the facts bearing upon the issue, there is no ground for holding that due process of law has been denied him.

The court goes further and discusses that proposition. I do not want to read all of the decision, but I shall insert so much of it as may bear upon this matter. I merely wished to read that to make plain that one fundamental principle that runs through all of the decisions. It is that you can make a judgment or decree prima facie evidence, you can make it anything you want, provided you do not shut out the party who is interested in the litigation and who will be affected by it from his right to show any evidence that he may want to show and from introducing any fact that bears upon the issue, and that there is preserved to the litigant the right to have the court or jury pass upon that evidence and give due consideration to those facts.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. As I read the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, it is subject to the criticism to which the Senator has referred, that a judgment or decree is only made prima facie evidence against the defendant. If the criticism is a good one as applied to the House provision, it seems to me it is equally good as to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. Not at all, Mr. President, and for this reason: What we are trying to do is to frame legislation under which, whenever the Government institutes a prosecution against trusts, where it is necessary to employ detectives and lawyers and investigators, costing thousands and thousands of dollars, any citizen might have the benefit of the results obtained by the Government in any suit which he might bring. We were not worrying about the cost to the trusts, which can get lawyers and investigators and experts whenever they want them; that part of it did not bother me any. I would not mind making it prima facie as to both parties. I think that it is probably right and that we should do so; but where you make it conclusive you have a different proposition; there you end the suit; you prevent anybody afterwards from putting in evidence what everybody might agree to be the exact facts. You are bound by the decree, and it can be used as an estoppel in favor of some one else who was not a party to the litigation.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it should be made conclusive; and I think it should be made conclusive only against the defendant for the identical reason which the Senator from West Virginia is giving why it should be made prima facie only against the defendant. I am not solicitous for the trusts; but if it is a just criticism that being final it should be final as to both, I insist that the same criticism would make it prima facie as to both.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the Senator says he is in favor of making it conclusive, and I know that he believes we have the constitutional right to do so; I take it that the Senator would not want to put on the statute books a law which would be inoperative and which the courts would be compelled to hold unconstitutional. It was to that point I was alluding. I am as much in favor as is the Senator of making it conclusive as to both parties, if we could do so. It is a peculiar kind of litigation that in its very nature ought to be made conclusive, if possible. It affects the public, and every decree should, if possible, settle the facts found for everybody. Business does not thrive upon litigation or uncertainty.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I want to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia if the trusts should escape and be acquitted in one action brought by the Government of the United States, whether he thinks they would be in very much peril from an action brought by a private individual on the same ground?

Mr. CHILTON. No; I do not; and I am no more worried about their peril than is the Senator from Montana. The Senator need not question me about that, because during a long service on the committee with him I think he has found that I have not been shuddering about the peril of the trusts and the dangers to which they may be subjected. I have, however, in good faith been trying to report to the Senate a proposed statute that I could maintain as a Senator here and retain my own self-respect, and could truthfully say to the Senate that I thought it conformed to the Constitution of the United States; and I would not agree to report any other kind of measure. It is because of my fears of the constitutionality of the House bill that I took the position which I did, and favored the Senate amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I want to bear testimony to the unfailing diligence of the Senator from West Virginia in the effort to frame legislation appropriate to the case and to my belief in his entire good faith in the position he has taken in the matter. I asked the question simply to indicate as forcefully as I could that the peril he sees in not making the estoppel reciprocal is one that is very vague and dim.

Mr. CHILTON. So far as the offending trust is concerned and so far as the question of injuring the trust is concerned I do not care to press the point, but so far as it may affect the courts and their reason for holding this legislation valid or invalid, my reason is not dim. I take it that we do not want to put upon the statute books one-sided legislation. We want to put on the statute books something that in our conscience we believe is right and fair. So far as I am concerned, if we are to enact a statute on this subject I want it to treat both sides alike, both the prosecutors, the Government, and the defendant. I do not assume that everyone who will be prosecuted under these laws will be guilty. It is entirely possible that some innocent people will be prosecuted under them, and if they are innocent I want them to have the benefit which every other citizen has under the law; and I am not afraid to say so in the Senate of the United States nor in any other place; and I have been just as zealous in putting teeth into the antitrust laws as any other member of the Judiciary Committee.

The next citation which I want to call to the attention of the Senate is the case of Chicago Railway Co. v. Minnesota (134 U. S., p. 456). In that case the Supreme Court of Minnesota had put a construction upon a statute of the State, and the Supreme Court of the United States in determining the validity of that statute, construed the statute as had the supreme court of the State, and, so construing it, held it to be invalid. This is what the court says about it:

> The supreme court (of that State) authoritatively declares that it is the expressed intention of the Legislature of Minnesota, by the statute, that the rates recommended and published by the commission, if it proceeds in the manner pointed out by the act, are not simply advisory, nor merely prima facie equal and reasonable, but final and conclusive as to what are equal and reasonable charges; that the law neither contemplates nor allows any issue to be made or inquiry to be had as to their equality or reasonableness in fact; that under the statute the rates published by the commission are the only ones that are lawful, and, therefore, in contemplation of law, the only ones that are equal and reasonable; and that, in a proceeding for mandamus under the statute, there is no fact to traverse except the violation of law in not complying with the recommendations of the commission. In other words, although the railroad company is forbidden to establish rates that are not equal and reasonable, there is no power in the courts to stay the hands of the commission if it chooses to establish rates that are unequal and unreasonable.

For that reason the court decides the law to be unconstitutional and invalid.

The next authority I want to call to the attention of the Senate is Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, seventh edition, page 526. Speaking of matters made evidence by statute it is said:

> But there are fixed bounds to the power of the legislature over this subject which can not be exceeded. As to what shall be evidence and which party shall assume the burden of proof in civil cases its authority is practically unrestricted so long as its regulations are impartial and uniform, but it has no power to establish rules which, under pretense of regulating the presentation of evidence, goes so far as altogether to preclude a party from exhibiting his rights. Except in those cases which fall within the familiar doctrine of estoppel at the common law, or other cases resting upon the like reasons, it would not, we apprehend, be in the power of the legislature to declare that a particular item of evidence should preclude a party from establishing his rights in opposition to it.

If the courts go to that extent as to a matter of evidence as between the same parties, what shall we say of the effort here to make a record in a suit between A and B binding in favor of the whole world besides, who have had no opportunity to participate in that trial and probably did not know at the time that their rights would ever be involved in the same set of circumstances or in the same class of litigation?

Proceeding, the same authority says:

> In judicial investigation the law of the land requires an opportunity for a trial—

That means an opportunity for a trial to each litigant as to every matter which has not been adjudicated as between him and the party with whom he may be litigating at the time.

Reading further:

> And there can be no trial if only one party is suffered to produce his proofs. The most formal conveyance may be a fraud or a forgery; public officers may connive with rogues to rob the citizen of his property; witnesses may testify or officers certify falsely, and records may be collusively manufactured for dishonest purposes; and that legislation which would preclude the fraud or wrong being shown, and deprive the party wronged of all remedy, has no justification in the principles of natural justice or of constitutional law.

And the authorities cited amply support that doctrine.

Mr. President, let me further illustrate: A brings a suit against a trust. Certain evidence is brought out. It may be in the power of one of the parties to that litigation afterwards to show that every witness who testified was mistaken; that the witnesses either perjured themselves or were mistaken as to the facts. It may be that the court and the jury and the public would be in such a state of mind as to want to render a different verdict. It is abhorrent to my mind that a statute can be constitutional which will put me in such a position that I who have not been a party to a litigation at all may be bound by a judgment rendered between other parties, although I have had no notice of the litigation, no opportunity to be heard, and may be in such a position that I can show the very contrary to be the fact.

I need not reiterate that the Committee on the Judiciary, without a single exception, was desirous of enacting a statute with teeth in it, as the expression is commonly used, one that would accomplish some good and would not merely play with this great subject; but when we came to investigate the question of the extent to which we could go a majority of that committee reached the conclusion that we could not go further than to make judgments or decrees rendered in a prior suit between other parties prima facie evidence. What does prima facie evidence mean? It means evidence sufficient to make out a case and to entitle one to recover unless overcome by proof. In other words, if A recovers judgment against B, then, in a suit brought by C against B, the former judgment that B has violated the law will entitle C to recover until and unless B shall overcome the prima facie case by competent evidence; and even then C is not precluded from introducing other evidence to support the prima facie case. It is an immense advantage for one to begin a lawsuit with sufficient evidence to entitle him to win; and that far we can go in safety.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator at that point, if he will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. A judgment when it is introduced in evidence in any suit operates by way of estoppel, and ordinarily an estoppel must be mutual in order to be operative. But, apart from that, the antitrust law gives to anyone who is injured the right to recover treble damages for the injury and attorneys' fees. The person injured is not compelled to wait for the action of the Government either in the way of bringing a criminal proceeding or a suit in equity. Now, suppose that we were to attempt to say that in a suit in equity or in a criminal proceeding brought by the Government to enforce the law a judgment in favor of the defendant or defendants should be conclusive evidence against the right of an individual to recover the damages which he had suffered by reason of the violation of the law or by reason of a wrongful act in restraining trade. That would involve the same principle of law precisely, would it not?

Mr. CHILTON. And would be abhorrent to a sense of justice.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would involve the same principle of law?

Mr. CHILTON. Exactly the same.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is to say, if there is such a privity between the United States as a governmental organization and its citizens as to enable us to make a judgment in favor of the Government binding upon all its citizens, we could in the same way make a judgment against the Government representing all its citizens conclusive against the right of any one of them to recover against the offender.

Mr. CHILTON. Does not the Senator think that if we make it conclusive against one we ought to make it conclusive against the other, in view of these authorities?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not so sure about that, because there are reasons which might be sufficient to remove this from the ordinary rule.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; there might, but they do not occur to me now.

Mr. CUMMINS. The strength of the one and the weakness of the other; but I think it shows beyond any question that we can not make it conclusive in favor of one or of the other. We can not make it conclusive against a person who is injured by such a wrongful act, nor can we make the judgment conclusive in favor of the person who has suffered from such wrongful act. In either case the person must be left, under the Constitution, to pursue his remedy, which is to recover these damages. I have always thought the utmost we could do would be to give the former legal proceedings prima facie effect in any suit brought by the individual.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. It does seem to me that the distinction there is too plain to admit of very much discussion. A suit is brought against a trust by the United States Government. That trust has its day in court. It is there with its lawyers and its witnesses. There is a vast difference between that trust, after having its day in court, being bound by that judgment, and a man who has been injured by the trust and who has not had his day in court, who has had no opportunity to present his case, being bound by the verdict against the Government.

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator will let me answer him, let us suppose that we have a case against a labor organization, which both the Senator and I believe should not be prosecuted merely as such under the statute. No doubt the Senator will vote with me upon that clause. Suppose it should be convicted. Must it remain forever under the ban of that decision, no matter what the fact may be?

The Senator is proceeding upon the idea that nobody will be prosecuted here but guilty people. Is it possible that you want one judgment rendered against a labor organization, if it should be rendered, to stand forever to bind it in other cases?

Take this case: A decree has been rendered in West Virginia holding a labor organization to be a criminal and violating the laws of the State. That judgment was rendered in the courts of West Virginia. Now, suppose other suits were brought against it and it could come in and show that the witnesses in the first case were mistaken, or swore falsely. Does the Senator want it to rest forever under that ban?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. CHILTON. All right.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no way on earth, in human affairs, of avoiding, sometimes, perhaps, a wrong; but when a judgment is rendered against me upon false testimony I have a time under the law in which I may present proof of the falsity of the testimony; and if the time goes by in which the court can interpose and grant a new trial, wrong and unjust as it is, it is one of the infirmities attendant upon human administration of affairs, and I have no escape from it.

Carrying out the same analogy of the ultimate finality of judicial proceedings, when a combination, a trust, or a company or an individual has had its day in court at the complaint of the public, and the time has expired within which, under the rules of law and equity, it may ask for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, that witnesses have been bribed, or any other occasion for which courts may relieve it from the judgment, there is no reason to my mind why the person who has suffered at the hands of the alleged wrongdoer should not have, equally with all the public, the benefit of that verdict and that trial, and not be compelled to travel the same weary, dreary course that the Government traveled in getting its verdict.

There is that difference between making the judgment prima facie evidence or conclusive evidence—for in this respect there can be no difference of opinion—as against the man or the combination that has had his or its day in court and making it conclusive or prima facie evidence against the man who has not been in court at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I trespass upon the time of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure. The Senator and I are in entire agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. We are now looking at the question from the legal standpoint alone, not from the sympathetic point of view nor from what might be called the standpoint of public policy. We have a Constitution; this is a country of law, and it is idle for us to enact a statute which will be stricken down by the courts.

I put to the Senator from West Virginia a case, and the Senator from Minnesota answered it by asserting a difference between the case I put and the case involved in the provision of the House bill. Let us see.

The Senator from Minnesota begins his argument by saying that in the case provided for in the House bill the corporation defendant has had its day in court. That statement assumes the whole controversy. The constitutional question is whether, under such circumstances, the defendant has had his day, or its day, in court. The argument of the Senator from Montana, which is persuasive, although, to my mind, not convincing, is that inasmuch as the Government of the United States represents all of the people of the United States, and all the people of the United States are privy with the Government in any suit that it brings and carries forward, therefore a judgment rendered in any such suit, if it be in favor of the Government, is a judgment rendered in favor of every citizen of that Government against the particular defendant who was being prosecuted. Upon that theory the well-known principle of the law, without any legislation whatever, would make the decree or judgment rendered in the suit conclusive as between all the citizens of the Republic; and it is only that reason that can bring the proposal within the scope of the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator pardon me just one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CHILTON. I will yield with pleasure a little later.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to show that the Senator from Minnesota assumed the real question in controversy when he made his first statement.

When the Government brings its suit and recovers, it is upon that theory adjudged, as between all the people and against the person or corporation against whom the recovery goes, that the facts are so-and-so and the law is so-and-so, just as I think it follows, if that reasoning be good, that if the judgment goes against the Government the person who asserts damages has had his day in court in the same way. He has had it through his own Government, which has prosecuted his case for him but has failed; and he therefore has had the same opportunities through his agent that many of these privies have had in the adjudicated cases with regard to a judgment covering a collection of persons. It seems to me pretty clear that if we can make the judgment conclusive in favor of the person who has been injured we can also make an adverse judgment conclusive against the citizen who asserts that he has been injured. I believe no one would contend that constitutionally we can do the latter.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana, although I yield at the courtesy of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. That is all right. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I so contend, and I think I shall be able to demonstrate that there is not any question about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That it could be made conclusive against the person?

Mr. WALSH. Against the citizen, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana is sometimes startling, but he is always logical. I simply wanted to have the proposal so clear that we could see it from every point of view.

Mr. CHILTON. I will say to the Senator that I do not want to occupy the floor for more than a few minutes, but I will yield to the Senator, if he would rather have me, at this point.

Mr. WALSH. No; I prefer to have the Senator conclude, first.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to read just one other authority.

In the Encyclopedia of Evidence, volume 3, page 292, the principle is stated in this way:

> But a law which would cut off the right of a party to offer evidence bearing on the question to be determined, by providing that certain matters or facts shall be conclusive evidence of the truth of the charge, or of that which is to be proved, would be unconstitutional and void, and could not therefore be upheld as a valid act of legislation. Hence a legislature can not lawfully declare what specific facts shall constitute conclusive proof of any matter sought to be judicially determined and established.

That statement is supported by a long line of authorities from practically all the States of the Union. There are very few of them that have not decided this to be the law.

Mr. President, after all, in my judgment, the worst enemy of reform in these matters, no matter how good his intentions may be, is the legislator who would take any chance as to the legislation which we may adopt being constitutional. We have a broad enough field within the Constitution. We are not restricted in a great many lines. There is just a little narrow line that we have struck here where there is at least great doubt as to this legislation. So far as I am concerned, I would prefer to take the open track, where we know we are right, and where we will not subject the citizen and the Government to long litigation and possibly, very probably, have some legislation we enact here declared unconstitutional and thereby make a gap in our legislation, or make it one sided, when there is no good reason for it. There is no good reason from the standpoint of policy, there is no good reason in the situation which confronts us, to suggest the taking of a desperate chance.

When you come to consider the difference between the making of a judgment conclusive and its being prima facie evidence, the advantage of the one over the other is not sufficient to warrant us in taking the chance. Why does anyone want to make a judgment against anybody, whether it be a trust or a citizen, a corporation or an individual, conclusive, and preclude him forever from showing the fact, if the fact be against the decree or judgment?

We are here to uphold justice between parties. We are not here to persecute anyone. There is no need of it. There is plenty of public sentiment against a trust which violates any of these statutes or the Sherman antitrust law to convict it if there be a proper case. In the one we say they shall not defend; in the other we say that there shall be a prima facie case against them.

Take all of these statutes in the States where they are enforcing prohibition laws, laws against the carrying of pistols, and so on. They never go beyond making a fact prima facie evidence. For instance, the carrying of liquor about your person, or being seen with liquor, is only prima facie evidence. They only make having the Government stamp or the payment of the Government tax prima facie evidence. We have a number of statutes of that kind in the various States; and this is the first attempt I have ever seen made anywhere to make a judgment between A and B conclusive evidence as between A and C or as between B and C. We are discussing something that never will be really material. Any citizen can have all the advantage from a prima facie case that he could have from a conclusive case.

Are we not now going beyond the real condition, the real trouble, that we started in to remedy? What we tried to do was to have some way by which the citizen could have the advantage of the evidence collected and produced by the Government. That is all that has been asked by the people. That is all that has been asked by those who have found difficulty in prosecuting these trust cases.

The Government goes out, under its great advantages and with its powers and its great resources, and makes a case against one of these trusts. Now, the citizen does not ask us to go into the field of conjecture and get him into trouble. He has not asked us to do that. He has not asked us to pass a doubtful statute which may get him into further difficulty and subject him to heavy costs. The citizen has simply asked us to give to him the benefit of the Government's case and make it prima facie evidence; to let him have that evidence certified in the other case against the trust concerning the same transaction or the same wrong. Therefore we are really, in my judgment, about to do as needless as a vain thing. What the people have asked for is the practical thing. It is a real reform. It will do some good. Why should we take chances?

So far as I am concerned, I have not much doubt that the courts will declare the House bill unconstitutional the first time it is put to the test. Believing that, I have voted for the amendment of the committee to make the judgment or decree prima facie evidence. In doing so I feel that we are giving the citizen and the country every advantage which justice demands. Until the authorities which I have cited shall be overthrown, or some one points out a precedent that justifies it, I can not vote for a law that makes a decree binding in favor of one not a party to the litigation in which it was rendered. Because of the large interest of the public in controlling these trusts, I will go to the limit of our power, and I believe that the Senate bill marks that limit.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] stepped out, but I hope he may come in. The Senator from Iowa seems to labor under the impression that it is a sufficient answer to the contention made by me in this connection to say that it is beyond the power of Congress to make the judgment conclusive against the citizen as well as in his favor, and therefore it follows that the judgment can not be made conclusive in his favor.

Mr. President, I am not at all ready to accept the idea of the Senator from Iowa that it is beyond the power of Congress to make the judgment in an antitrust case conclusive against the citizen. In fact, I entertain no doubt whatever about the power of Congress to do that much. About that I believe there can be no two opinions upon serious reflection, because the citizen has a right of action at all merely because the statute gives it to him. If there were no statute, he would have no right of action.

It is true, Mr. President, that it is not necessary to convey the right of action in express terms, but as was declared here upon the floor a few days ago the bare fact that the law denounces these acts as unlawful gives a right of action to anyone who may be damaged by the acts thus put under the ban of the law. But the law simply carries by implication the right of action to the man who has been injured. In other words, his right of action rests upon the law; it has its origin in the statute. Congress gives to him the right of action, and when Congress gives to him the right of action Congress may attach to it any conditions it may see fit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I will yield in just a moment. It may develop that although the acts denounced in the statute are unlawful, no citizen shall have right of action by reason of any damages sustained in consequence thereof until after judgment shall have been rendered in an action brought by the Government. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt whatever about the last statement of the Senator from Montana. We have just such a provision as he has mentioned in the interstate-commerce law. A shipper who claims to have been overcharged can not bring a suit in the Federal courts until the rate has been found to be unreasonably high by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is a condition precedent to the institution of a suit of that character. We could do so here. We could say that no suit shall be tried under the laws of the United States until a proceeding had terminated favorable to the United States in a suit brought for that purpose. That was not my proposition. We have given this cause of action. Those who suffer have the cause of action; and we are preparing a rule of evidence here. It was my proposition that, leaving the cause of action as it is, we could not say that the citizen could not prosecute that cause of action if a judgment against the Government had been rendered in a suit brought for the enforcement of the law.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is talking about a cause of action which has already accrued.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am talking about leaving the statute as it is, with the cause of action in the hands of the citizen who is injured. We can, of course, destroy that cause of action entirely. We can repeal the provision of the antitrust law—there is no doubt of that—so that neither the Government nor citizen shall have any cause of action; but so long as we leave the cause of action I do not believe we can say that a judgment rendered between different parties shall be conclusive as between the injured citizen and the offending corporation.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator did not let me quite finish the line of the argument. However, he agrees with me now that we could amend the Sherman Antitrust Act so that it should provide that in the future no citizen shall be entitled to prosecute an action for damages resulting from the violation of the law until after a suit shall have been prosecuted by the United States and a judgment rendered in the action in favor of the Government. Therefore, if a suit was brought by the Government of the United States and failed, but a judgment were rendered against the Government, then the effect of a statute making that judgment conclusive against the citizen in an action brought by him would have exactly the same effect as a statute such as I first indicated, which denied to anyone the right to recover in an action unless first a judgment were rendered by the Government of the United States. In other words, a statute providing that no one could recover in an action of that character until after a judgment had been rendered in favor of the United States would be exactly the same as if it said that a judgment rendered in favor of the corporation shall be conclusive evidence against anyone prosecuting a private action for damages resulting from the unlawful combination. The two statutes would have exactly the same force and effect, and if you admit the power of Congress to pass the one you must admit the power of Congress to pass the other. So to my mind there is not any question about the right of Congress to make the judgment in the action prosecuted by the Government of the United States conclusive evidence against a citizen who prosecutes a private action for damages resulting from the act.

Mr. President, if we can pass that kind of a statute, why can we not pass the reciprocal of it; in other words, a statute providing that it shall be conclusive evidence when the judgment goes in favor of the judgment of the United States.

Now, just one other thought. The Senator recognizes the principle of the binding force of judgments by representation, a judgment in favor of a single individual binding upon all the members of the class which he represents, and he indicates that there is a close analogy, as undoubtedly there is, between a judgment of that character and a judgment in a suit brought by the Government of the United States, which represents all the citizens of the United States. I do not think that the principle of representation has ever been extended so far as to embrace all the citizens of a State in an action brought by the State; but why should it not? Is it not a perfectly arbitrary rule that excludes it? Where are you going to draw the line? Does not the Government of the United States in these prosecutions truly and rightly and justly represent its citizens in the prosecution of the action? It would be only a very little extension of the principle to include judgments brought in actions prosecuted by the Government or by the State.

I want to say just a word with reference to the authorities to which the attention of the Senate has been invited by the learned Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. Nobody questions them. They all lay down the rule that in an action brought against an individual who has never theretofore had his day in court you can not make a certificate or a recital or an order of an administrative board or anything of that kind conclusive evidence against him. You may make it prima facie evidence. A tax deed is made prima facie evidence of the truth of all its recitals. The notice of a mining claim filed in the office of the county recorder is prima facie evidence of all the facts recited in it and required to be recited in it by the statute; indeed the principle is general that whenever the law requires a certain document to be filed containing certain recitals that document becomes prima facie evidence of the truth of the recitals therein, and you can not make it conclusive. That is quite a different thing. Here the party has had his day in court. He has tried every issue, and it is simply a question, now that he has had it tried, whether he may insist upon a second trial.

Let me say, Mr. President, that we are proceeding against organizations denounced as unlawful by this law as guilty of crime, as a peril to the State, as a menace to ordinary business transactions, as fraught with danger to the public. That is the kind of an organization we are dealing with, and there is a judgment rendered by the court to the effect that it is so guilty.

Mr. President, I submit that that is a different kind of a judgment from one which would ordinarily be rendered in an ordinary private controversy between two citizens, and I submit that you violate no principle of justice by making that judgment conclusive against the party who thus is adjudged to be a violator of the law and leave it still subject to prosecution by a private party. They can not be put upon the same ground. They stand upon an entirely different footing.

I assert, sir, that there is no element of injustice in the policy expressed by the House bill that these judgments are to be conclusive against the corporation, leaving the private citizen, if he desires to take upon himself the burden of a subsequent prosecution at his own expense, the right to do so.

When a trust or a combination of any kind has been prosecuted by the great Government of the United States, and has been victorious in that fight, coming out of it with a judgment of acquittal, I wonder how many there are of us who are fearful that some private individual will thereafter harass and annoy the corporation by the institution and prosecution of another suit at his own expense? There is no need for a provision of that character; and, Mr. President, the law is not open to the charge of injustice when it does not give the right to the corporation or the combination, whatever it may be, to assert the conclusive character of the judgment which was rendered in its favor when it is brought again to the bar by a private individual.

So, Mr. President, it occurs to me that there is no constitutional objection to the House provision, and that it embodies a wise policy the argument upon all sides admits.

Mr. President, I desire to submit in connection with my remarks a brief portion of a late editorial in Harper's Weekly upon this subject, which I ask may be read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows from Harper's Weekly for August 15, 1914:

> The Clayton bill, as it passed the House, carried out the President's suggestion effectively by providing that a judgment for the Government shall be conclusive evidence in damage suits by private individuals. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate, however, has changed the provision so as to keep the word of promise to our ear and break it to our hope. As reported to the Senate, the provision is that the judgment for the Government shall be merely prima facie evidence in private suits. This destroys the expected benefit. In order to overcome the prima facie effect of the Government's judgment, the trusts will only have to introduce some new evidence, and then the whole matter will be open for determination by a jury. No private individual will be able to sue without being ready to prove over again all that the Government proved. This is something that small victims of the trusts can not afford to do. It is essential that the Government's judgment should be conclusive evidence of the violation of the anti-trust law, and the Senate should see that it is made so, as the House did.

Mr. CHILTON. If the writer of that article does not know anything more about this subject than he knows about what prima facie evidence means, we can well submit the question to the Senate without any reference to the knowledge that writer has of the law of the land.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has suggested what I think is an improvement upon my proposed amendment. He has suggested that the words "heretofore or hereafter" be inserted after the word "decree," in line 12. I ask leave to change the amendment which I offered, so as to correspond with that suggestion. The clause would then read:

> That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any suit or proceeding—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to have it reported, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 12, in the proposed committee amendment, after the word "decree" insert the words "heretofore or hereafter," so as to read:

> That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any suit or proceeding in equity—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask for a division. I am not sure that I understand it, but I was drawing an amendment intended to clear what I considered as an ambiguity in the section. Will not the Senator from Colorado allow his amendment to go over until I have a chance to read it in connection with the amendment I desire to offer?

Mr. THOMAS. I think I can explain it in a moment. The purpose of the amendment is to make the decrees heretofore rendered as well as those hereafter rendered prima facie evidence.

Mr. HUGHES. I will ask the Senator to let it go over until I have had a chance to compare it with an amendment that I intended to offer.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado withdraw his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. No. It goes over without objection, I understand.

Mr. HUGHES. To be pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment will have to go over, then.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think we can determine this matter without its going over. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the amendment to the amendment is plain enough. The only question is whether the Senate wants to adopt it.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I want to debate it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can we not take the vote on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to strike out or disagree, and if the Senate disagrees to the amendment there will be no need of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CULBERSON. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that is adopted, it can be amended subsequently.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the situation exactly. There has been an amendment offered to the committee amendment, and the Chair can not put the question on the amendment of the committee until the amendment to the amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. CHILTON. In other words, the Senate has a right to perfect the amendment before it is voted upon.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming the condition to be as the Chair has indicated, I have not yet offered my amendment. When the committee amendment is perfected, I imagine that the motion will be in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the proposition of the Senator from Montana to be to retain the House provision instead of the committee amendment. That question ought to be determined upon the proposition as to whether the committee amendment shall prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question about that. The committee amendment before the Senate has been proposed to be amended by the Senator from Colorado. The Chair asked the Senator from Colorado whether he would withdraw his amendment. He said "no."

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado to withdraw it. He can offer it in the Senate and we can proceed with this legislation in Committee of the Whole. He can withhold it and let us take the question on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HUGHES. It seems to me that the Senator from Colorado has a right to attempt to perfect the text.

Mr. OVERMAN. He can do that hereafter.

Mr. HUGHES. It seems to me this is the most convenient way to get at it. I will simply state what I have to say on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado and call his attention to what I regard as its vice, as I have already called it to the attention of the various members of the committee. The House provision contains the word "hereafter"; it reads:

That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought—

And so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. The provision makes it conclusive.

Mr. HUGHES. That a final judgment hereafter rendered shall operate in a certain way. The Senator from Colorado seeks to provide that a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered shall operate in a certain way. The difficulty about that is we are opening up a vast field of litigation with reference to transactions that have passed and gone. This may well be productive of more litigation than anybody here dreams of; in fact, I know that it will be.

There is this also to be said, that in a great many of these cases consent decrees were entered by agreement and arrangement between the Government and the parties who were charged with offenses, and it does not seem to me fair that the Government, which induced these men, in order to save it the expense and trouble and time of litigation, to consent to a decree, which the Government might not have been able to obtain by regular procedure, before the case was tried, before a judgment was had, should afterwards, when that decree has been obtained by their consent, change the law and put them in a position which leaves them absolutely no redress or no recourse of any kind.

If Senators would stop for a moment to consider this they would realize that a great many of these consent decrees have been entered, and in every case thousands of individuals may claim that they have been injured and come in under the shelter of a consent decree and proceed against the defendant who consented to it probably because it desired to conduct its business in the way the Government said that it should. Without admitting that it had violated the law, but in order to make its peace and continue along the line mapped out for it by the Government, friendly cooperation existing between the defendant charged with an offense and the Government, the corporation may have given its consent to the entering of a decree, saying, "Very well, we will consent that in the future we shall not be permitted to do this."

This amendment opens that whole subject up to the time of the entering of the decree. I want Senators to understand that before they vote on it. I certainly would not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. The language of the bill as it came from the House provided explicitly that all the decrees entered hereafter should be of the binding force and effect sought to be given by this proposed statute. My understanding from the talk I have had with the various members of the committee is that it has been their idea and their intention that this proposed act should operate prospectively and not retrospectively.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, there is no question but that the House provision is intended to operate prospectively, the only way it could operate if Congress has power to make such judgments conclusive.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senate amendment, also, is prospective.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senate amendment, however, is one which makes the judgements prima facie evidence. That being so, when the judgment is introduced as being prima facie evidence, it does not preclude the defendant against whom the judgment was rendered from explaining away its force and effect, that constituting the chief defect of the section, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has so well shown.

It is true that there are judgments which have been entered and decrees which have been entered by consent in some of these cases, but there are no cases in which any corporation was a defendant which I can now call to mind in which a consent decree was entered but that such decree would have been entered after final trial, the consent decree being influenced by what the inevitable result of the case would be. The mere fact that it is a consent judgment does not, it seems to me, detract from the privilege, if it be one, which this proposed statute gives of making the decrees prima facie evidence; and I am unable to distinguish between the justice of making a decree rendered upon a suit brought after this bill becomes a law prima facie evidence and making a decree rendered upon similar suits brought before this bill becomes a law prima facie evidence. Hence the amendment which I have suggested, that final judgment heretofore or hereafter rendered shall be prima facie evidence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HUGHES. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those in favor of the amendment will rise. Those opposed will rise. The amendment is carried.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I announce my pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the negative). I inquire whether the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED. The conditions of my pair are that I may vote in order to make a quorum; and if we are lacking a quorum, and I am advised of that fact, I will vote.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STONE. I inquire whether the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. STONE. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED. Under the circumstances I desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN. If my vote is necessary to make a quorum, I have the right to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED. Before the vote is announced I desire to know whether a quorum has voted.

Mr. GORE. I understand that my vote will be necessary to make a quorum. Under such circumstances I have the right to vote, and I vote "yea."

The result was—yeas 23, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Jones	Pittman	Thomas
Bristow	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Cummins	Lane	Reed	Vardaman
Gore	Len, Tenn.	Shafroth	Walsh
Hitchcock	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	White
James	Owen	Shively

NAYS—23.

Bankhead	Gallinger	Newlands	Smoot
Bryan	Hughes	Overman	Sterling
Burton	Lippitt	Poindexter	Swanson
Chilton	McCumber	Ransdell	Thornton
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Williams
Culberson	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

NOT VOTING—50.

Borah	Fall	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Goff	Oliver	Stephenson
Burleigh	Gronna	Page	Stone
Camden	Hollis	Penrose	Sutherland
Catron	Johnson	Perkins	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Robinson	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Root	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Lewis	Saulsbury	Weeks
Colt	Lodge	Sherman	West
Crawford	McLean	Shields	Works
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
du Pont	Myers	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado the yeas are 23, the nays are 23. Senators CHAMBERLAIN, GRONNA, and STONE are present and have announced their pairs. That makes a quorum as the Chair figures it. The Chair votes "yea," and the amendment is adopted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to say in that connection that I have no understanding with my pair allowing me to vote in order to constitute a quorum, but I have no objection to being counted as present.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 110) to regulate trading in cotton futures, and provide for the standardization of "upland" and "gulf" cottons separately, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate, Monday, August 17, 1914, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 18, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 17, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We come to Thee, O God, our refuge and our strength, knowing full well that each moment is a moment of probation, that each day is a day of judgment, and without Thine aid we shall fail in our duties. Help us therefore to resist evil, to cleave unto that which is good, that we may accomplish Thy commands in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 15, 1914, was read and approved.

OFFICE OF INFORMATION, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. This is unanimous-consent day; and the rule provides that, after the approval of the Journal, bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be called. I have a privileged resolution from the Committee on Agriculture. I desire to inquire if it would be in order to call up that resolution at this time?

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman certain it is privileged?

Mr. LEVER. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be in order to call it up.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following privileged resolution (H. Rept. 1092).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read House resolution 573, requesting and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to give to the House full detailed information in regard to certain matters under the administration of the Department of Agriculture, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, requested and directed to give to the House full detailed information in regard to the following matter:

First. Is there under the administration of the Department of Agriculture a press agency, or bureau of any kind or character, that is run for the purpose of preparing and giving out information for publication?

Second. Is not this bureau or agency known as the "office of information"? If not, what is the title by which it is known? How many persons are employed in this "office of information"? Give the name of each employee in the "office of information," the salary that he receives, and the roll upon which he is carried.

Third. State whether or not one George W. Whorton is employed in the Department of Agriculture; and if so, what are his duties and what salary does he receive and upon what pay roll is he carried? When did he receive this position, and how? Was he not in charge of this publicity work before he took the civil-service examination?

Fourth. Is one E. B. Mitchell employed in the Department of Agriculture? If so, what are his duties, what salary does he receive, and how did he secure his present position? Was he not appointed to a position and placed upon the pay roll of the department without civil-service examination?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who is the author of the resolution, desires 10 minutes. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the committee have reported this resolution favorably. I trust there will be no opposition to its passage. In fact, it would be a public calamity, if not a tragedy, if it should fail to pass, because I understand that a report has already been prepared by Mr. Whorton, one of the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the resolution. Of course, it will be entirely unprejudiced and complete, no doubt. I understand that in this report that is to be made the gentleman passes somewhat lightly over the explanation as to how he got into his present position. The civil-service rules are not unduly magnified. He now receives a salary of some $3,000 a year. But, Mr. Speaker, what I particularly desire to call to the attention of the House in regard to the resolution, and why I think it ought to be passed, is what I conceive to be an abuse that has grown up in this department, as well as in others, in regard to publicity. The gentlemen on that side of the aisle are as much interested in this proposition as we are, and perhaps more.

These publicity bureaus are constantly seeking more power and more money, new employment and new places for men, and then bringing outside influence and outside pressure here upon Congress for us to make appropriations in order that the work they suggest may be carried out.

I will mention one or two recent publications furnished by this particular publicity bureau. Recently they published a circular widely over this country of what they called a bird census. Of course they might as well have had a grasshopper census or a fly census or a mosquito census. That field is unlimited. Here is an opportunity to give unnumbered experts a place on the Government pay roll. It is true they claim that most of that information about the bird census was furnished them voluntarily; it certainly is worthless enough to be free. But the work of sending out 50,000 letters per day, distributing these bird-census publicity stories, was paid for by the Government, and the men employed in sending them out were paid by the Government. Then here a short time ago they had another article about the life of a milk bottle. Now, think what great public interest that has. Think of the ignorance that prevails in this country to-day about the life of a milk bottle. There are people to-day in this country that belong to good families, honest and God-fearing, that do not know how long the average milk bottle lives. Think of that. Who for $100,000 per year would be denied this information, vital to the Nation's welfare? Of course the men that buy these bottles and use them do not know, so the salvation rests entirely with the Government expert. The Nation must have information on birds and bottles, even if it does have to employ 20 experts and pay $100,000 annually. This is the character of some of the work that they are doing.

But that is only a minor matter compared to the one concerning which I spoke a moment ago. I want to give you an illustration along that line, of the real reason why I think the House ought to investigate and find out the facts; and I know that my distinguished friend [Mr. LEVER], the chairman of this Committee on Agriculture, is as much interested in this as I am, and more so, because he has to look after those appropriations. I hold in my hand one of their publicity documents that was sent out on July 21 last. It refers to the appointment of Mr. Franklin H. Smith, now statistician in the Forest Product Division in the Department of Agriculture, as commercial agent at $3,000 a year in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which appointment has been approved by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield. It says:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, July 21, 1914.

The appointment of Mr. Franklin H. Smith, now statistician in forest products in the Department of Agriculture, as commercial agent at $3,000 in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been approved by Secretary of Commerce Redfield. Mr. Smith is recommended by the Forest Service as admirably equipped with knowledge of market conditions and conditions in the lumber industry to make useful investigations for the Department of Commerce. It is proposed to send him to China, Japan, India, Australia, New Zealand, the Pacific Islands, and the East Indies to conduct lumber-market investigations, as it seems that those portions of the world offer the most attractive possible markets for lumber products.

Now, they say this man is a great expert. Who else ever said he was a great expert? He was an agent in the Forestry Service receiving $900 a year. Now he suddenly becomes a great expert and his salary increased. He may be an expert. But suppose he is, why should the Government pay to advertise that fact to the world? We could all get a reputation if the Government would advertise us and permit nothing but what we prepared ourselves to be published about us. That bulletin is followed up by another, dated July 27, in which they set out in detail great necessity for investigation of the various lumber industries of the country. I did not select this one because it happened to be the lumber industry, but because it happened to be the one that came under my hand. It says:

WASHINGTON, July 27.

The plans now being perfected for the Forest Service part of the inquiry to be made jointly by the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture into timber and lumber trade conditions in the United States provide for covering entirely new ground.

Lumbermen are now admittedly conducting their operations with a large percentage of waste, said to be largely due to market conditions which make close utilization unprofitable. There is no general agreement as to the actual causes of existing conditions and the responsibility for present undoubted evils. With rapidly diminishing supplies of timber to draw upon, wasteful lumbering has come to be recognized as a matter of serious public concern, and an inquiry to discover the causes and seek for possible remedies is regarded by Forest Service officials as an urgent need. It is believed that the lumber industry itself recognizes the need and will welcome an inquiry conducted along constructive lines.

This publication says that there is great necessity to employ a number of experts to investigate the lumber industry. Publicity, more experts, more money, more publicity, an endless chain that runs always through the Public Treasury. The result of it will be that they will be in here next year asking that Congress appropriate larger sums of money than ever before. The trouble about this publicity proposition is that they only publish one side, the side furnished by these great experts, and then the people believe that the Members of this House are not performing their public duty when they refuse to make appropriations to pay these experts. The experts get publicity only on one side, and that is the favorable side. The Members of this House have publicity, but it comes from both directions. They are both criticized and praised. As a result the impression is gradually gaining ground throughout this country to-day that the ability and the honesty of this country rest in its bureaus, and that whenever we refuse to make appropriations here we are failing in our duty; and, as I said a while ago, that side of the House is more interested in a thorough investigation of these agents at present than are we. This impression in regard to the bureau expert and of Congress is largely brought about by this constant publicity sent out by the departments. It is not fair to the people of the country. Through this advertisement the people have come largely to believe that the bureau chief is always a wise man, a great man, and a patriot, and that the Congressman that refuses to vote for any appropriation he asks is a petty politician.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman will yield me a minute or two more if I need it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Washington that this is unanimous-consent day, and I do not want to interfere with it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want only three or four minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I will take care of that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am confused in regard to this. The gentleman's resolution is an inquiry going to the existence of a publicity bureau in the Agricultural Department?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And this man Smith, of whom he speaks, is not in the department? Does the resolution go to the correction of the evil, so far as Smith is concerned, if it is an evil?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is mistaken. He is in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thought he had been transferred to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes, now; but he was appointed from the Department of Agriculture. I am simply calling attention to the fact that they used this publicity department to advertise some man as a great expert, and then they come here, and we pay him an increased salary.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not true that if it had not been for this publicity bureau the gentleman would not have known of the instance of Smith?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true; I would not have known of it. But when I looked for Smith's record I find that the only place that he is considered an expert is by the particular people who want an increase in his salary; and that is followed up four or five days later by showing the great necessity for an investigation in other departments, and so they want more experts, and that will take more salary, and they will be here asking Congress to give it to them.

I want to call attention to another phase of this. I hold in my hand an editorial printed in the Washington Times of July 23, a column long, in which these press agents are upheld, intimating that I am lacking in patriotism because I have called for an investigation. Why should not this paper and the gentleman who wrote the editorial make such statements as that? If I am reliably informed one of the men who is connected with this paper, probably the very gentleman who wrote this editorial, in a single year has received over $12,000 for publicity stuff that he has sent out, which was furnished to him by the publicity bureaus of the Government. Why should he not want this to go ahead? He is to be praised that he praises his friend, no man should smite the hand that feeds him. It is profitable, and the whole thing just makes the circuit I mentioned a while ago. I quote from the editorial:

The department authorities will make no mistake if they go boldly to the defense of their publicity organization and methods. In fact, if they would frankly proclaim that they need more press agents, more money to pay them, the privilege of paying bigger salaries, they would make a fetching case.

* * * * * * *

A high official of that department, not now connected with it, once said that if he had any chance of getting Congress to allow it, he would pay the chief of his publicity service the same salary that the Secretary of Agriculture gets. He would do it, of course, only on condition of getting a man worth that salary; but he said he could find such a man, and that, having found him, he would make the investment return profits manyfold in the usefulness of the department's work.

So that it all leads right in a circuit back to the National Treasury—the creation of public sentiment throughout the country, making the people believe that Congress is not performing its duty when it does not vote unlimited amounts of money to continue these investigations and to pay these so-called experts, that they may furnish profitable publicity stories to their newspaper friends, who will, of course, then defend them in any demands on Congress. It is beautiful and it is profitable and it works.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the gentleman sits down I would like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina to yield him one minute.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is leaving an impression that he did not intend to leave in the latter part of his remarks. He says some writer on the Times has made $12,000 in one year.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I mean Mr. Judson Welliver.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not mean to say that Mr. Judson Welliver or anyone else on the Times has drawn from the Treasury of the United States $12,000 a year?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; and I did not say anything of the kind. I said if I was correctly informed, and I believe that I am, Mr. Judson Welliver in a single year received over $12,000 from articles that he furnished to the press, and he received the information from the publicity bureaus of the various departments.

Mr. MURDOCK. If he did any such thing, the gentleman ought to say also that it was a perfectly legitimate earning on the part of Mr. Judson Welliver.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is perfectly legitimate earning on his part, perhaps, but here is the result of it coming back, defending these publicity agents and saying that we ought to have more, so that they can furnish more news to newspaper correspondents in order that they may sell it to the press. Mr. Welliver's action in defending his friends is not only legitimate but shows his gratitude.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not undertake to say that a newspaper man has not the right to get information from a bureau, put it into readable form, and sell it as syndicate matter?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; but I undertake to say that this Government ought not to pay men in the departments to create publicity articles to furnish to newspaper men to sell to the press.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is the gentleman's opinion. The Government is not hurt by more publicity. The gentleman's chief item of complaint this morning was made possible because the Government had a bureau of publicity.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman wants to defend a bird and grasshopper census, he is the proper man to do so. They will probably be making one in his State before long.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this resolution has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on Agriculture. The committee does not believe that the Department of Agriculture has any facts which it desires to conceal. I therefore move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the time arrived to offer an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not do it unless the gentleman from South Carolina yields the floor.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of line 8, on page 2, the following:

"Is this press bureau being now used or has it been heretofore used for private interests, either directly or indirectly?"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Speaker, I may not be able to finish in 10 minutes, and I would like to have permission to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can not the gentleman use only 5 minutes and then extend his remarks?

Mr. LIEB. Oh, I would like to have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Indiana addressing the House for 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Speaker, for a long and uninterrupted period Congress has been authorizing improvements of rivers and harbors. Some of the projects included in the river and harbor appropriation bill now pending are the result of years and years of discussion, debate, and careful deliberation. These navigation projects are so well known, have been so carefully planned, and the benefits to be eventually derived are so self-evident that no one can deny that the essential provisions of the bill are so important that the very prosperity of a large portion of our country is at stake the minute we hesitate in our program.

And yet hesitation has come. There are many wavering. Opposition has been raised in the Senate after the House, knowing no party lines in the consideration of this legislation, has passed the measure practically without opposition.

I would like to call attention to the fact that the Democratic platform of 1912 came out in unequivocal language in favor of the continuation of the improvement of our waterways. I quote from the platform of the Baltimore convention:

> Water furnishes the cheaper means of transportation, and the National Government, having the control of navigable waters, should improve them to their fullest capacity. We earnestly favor the immediate adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for improving every watercourse in the Union which is justified by the needs of commerce.

So there is no Democrat who is within my hearing who can deny that we are pledged to lend our support to the program of river and harbor improvement. While it is true that the Democratic House has passed the appropriation bill, there is danger that the Democratic Senate will allow the legislation to drift on to another session. While the blame is primarily with the opposition party on the other side of the Capitol, yet the responsibility must be assumed from a moral and party standpoint by the Democratic Senators whose party platform points in but one direction, namely, the continuation of a well-defined program for the improvement of waterways. I might also add that the platforms of other political parties came out in strong terms in favor of river and harbor improvement.

I say, it will be a monumental outrage if certain opponents of the bill are allowed to carry out their ambitions of wrecking what to my mind is the most important measure before the present Congress, with the possible exception of one or two other bills which our platform stands for.

EYES OF 15,000,000 ON CONGRESS.

While I speak to you as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and am ready to defend my attitude on any item of the appropriation bill, I will in the course of my remarks to-day touch more particularly upon the situation in the Ohio Valley, as the people of my district, along with about 15,000,000 other people, are the direct beneficiaries of Ohio River improvement. For the past several months I have made it a part of my business to ascertain the true sentiments of the people of my district with reference to what has been done in Washington by the Democratic administration. I have been struck and impressed by the general commendation of the people of the essential acts of the Sixty-third Congress. The people as a whole seem to be satisfied and as content with conditions as at any time since the masses began to demand economic reform as a result of oppression. In the Middle West we feel business depression or prosperity as quick as in any section of the country, and our status in this respect can nearly always be taken as a barometer of future business aspects over our now prosperous land. With our factories now running full time and with business at a high ebb in general, my people at home now have all eyes turned to Congress on account of the danger of failure of the rivers and harbors appropriation bill.

Business men and the people in general feel that the entire Ohio Valley will feel the injurious effect of suspension of improvement for a 9-foot stage from Pittsburgh to Cairo. What I mean by a suspension can be more vividly expressed by stating that there are 17 locks and dams under course of construction on the Ohio River, a majority of which are not yet half completed. If the pending appropriation bill does not pass this Congress, work on these improvements will be most seriously hampered, and if the suspension is only a few months there is a precedent set which some may take advantage of for future suspension of the plan for the canalization of the entire river. It would be a blotch upon the pages of our transportation history to change our program, not only in regard to the Ohio River but other streams of water which we are proud to call our free highways of commerce.

When we speak of encouraging commerce we should not lose sight of the fact that we have spent millions for the construction of the Panama Canal in order that our commerce and trade channels might be stimulated. When we go without the boundary lines of the States to provide for an outlet to the Pacific Ocean, and then fail to continue our policy of building up our avenues of water commerce within our boundaries, we commit an offense to our industries and business institutions.

OHIO RIVER AS GREAT AN ASSET AS PANAMA CANAL.

Some people might have an idea that a comparison of the Ohio River with the Panama Canal is incongruous. But I want to state that there is practically as much commerce on the Ohio River at the present time as there will be on the Panama Canal when it is in full operation. There were 9,814,123 tons of freight floated on the Ohio River last year, while it is estimated that the Panama Canal will carry from ten to twelve millions annually—American tonnage, coastwise, foreign, all combined. When it comes to comparison with all the navigable rivers appropriated for in the pending rivers and harbors bill, the Panama Canal is insignificant in consideration of the freight tonnage figures. The rivers appropriated for in this bill last year floated 369,000,000 tons. In other words, the rivers for which we wish to provide in this bill carry more than thirty times as much freight as will the Panama Canal. In one year these rivers float more tonnage than the Panama Canal will in the next 30 years, based on the present estimate of commerce on the canal.

Now, in speaking of the commerce on the Ohio River, I think I can say without contradiction that when the Federal Government has completed its system of canalization so that navigation can be had the year round there will be a marked increase in freight shipments. The Panama Canal itself will be the goal and is the goal for shipping from the Ohio River and Valley. Industry will be greatly stimulated in the Middle West, and already the people are getting ready to reap rich benefits from the use of the canal. The benefits that have come with the completion of each movable dam on the Ohio accrue to every mine and factory in the valley.

INDUSTRIAL GROWTH FOLLOWS RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

I believe that one of the strongest arguments in favor of the early completion of a 9-foot stage of the Ohio River is the immense industrial benefits that will be enjoyed by the great Ohio Valley as a direct result thereof; and, of course, an era of unprecedented commercial prosperity will not only be of a permanent nature, but it will be felt with good effect by the entire country.

For the past several years the section known as the lower Ohio Valley has been enjoying a new era of prosperity, and this can be attributed to nothing else than the expectation of future benefits of the canalization of the river, which will afford a dependable outlet to the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean as well, through the Panama Canal.

If anyone thinks I may be misrepresenting the conditions as to the great industrial impetus that has taken hold of the Ohio Valley since the people began to believe that the Federal Government was in earnest in the plan to afford a 9-foot stage from Pittsburgh to Cairo I will show that person some interesting figures regarding the three largest cities on the Ohio River below Pittsburgh. These cities—Cincinnati, Louisville, and Evansville—have grown faster in the last 5 years than they did in the whole preceding 10 years. The best barometer in judging these conditions of growth is by the building operations. Therefore I give the records, which speak for themselves:

Evansville building operations for two 5-year periods, showing gain of 87 per cent.

1905	598,000
1906	1,048,000
1907	1,077,000
1908	833,000

Three cities, 1904 to 1908, inclusive	58,110,805
Gain in last 5-year period	22,410,422

Or 38.5 per cent.

The growth of these cities is but a criterion of how the entire Ohio Valley is awakened to the possibilities of a 9-foot stage. Everywhere are signs of unprecedented activity.

COMMISSION WOULD SIDETRACK PENDING WORK.

An amusing aspect of the efforts of the opposition to sidetrack the rivers and harbors bill is the amendment introduced which would provide for the appointment of a commission to be known as the river regulation commission, with the alleged object of investigating questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation. Gentlemen, we do not wish to surrender the rights of our Constitution or to delay legislation by the creation of a commission as a cowardly subterfuge to evade responsibility. The people selected this Congress to legislate, not to procrastinate. This amendment providing for a river regulation commission should be renamed a bill to allow Congress to abrogate its constitutional functions. Members of Congress are elected to represent their particular districts. They keep in touch with the conditions at home. So it is that every Representative and Senator is given the privilege—and the privilege is usually asserted—to state the needs of the respective localities to the committee which has the particular business at hand. In this way the committee is enabled to separate the good from the bad.

Now, the bill which was reported out to the House by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, was as fair as could be demanded. Absolutely no partiality was shown. Each item was thoroughly considered, after receiving exhaustive reports from the Board of Engineers of the War Department, and there is no item that is indefensible. There is not a man on the committee who is not willing to cooperate in this statement. I do not speak without personal knowledge of conditions when I say the deliberations or findings of the committee have never been interspersed with political influence nor could they be regarded in the light of a so-called "pork barrel." The procedure has been simple and open and above board. The Army engineers who reported on each item are as competent, or more competent, than any similar set of men that could be mustered together. No matter what project they reported on after making exhaustive surveys and investigations that project would not receive the O. K. of the committee without first being recommended by the engineers. Does anyone question the competence of the engineers? Does anyone question the integrity or knowledge of conditions as to river improvements of any member of the committee?

RIVER-REGULATION COMMISSION A PORK BARREL.

Now, speaking of "pork barrel" and economy, what is the proposed amendment for the creation of a river-regulation commission but a "pork barrel"? It proposes to take a cold half million dollars out of the United States Treasury in order to give the commission several years in which to study the question. In the meantime a lot of the contractors on the thirty-odd locks and dams on the Ohio River, and the scores of contractors on other rivers and harbors, would be financially ruined, the people along the rivers would become disheartened, industries would be idle, and millions of people would suffer, either directly or indirectly, while the commission was endeavoring to study a new question to most of them, which is an old question to Congress.

No Member can dodge this issue of a commission. It is an old war cry of a certain political party.

It is to the interest of everyone to know that the Federal Government has in the last 45 years spent over $7,000,000 of the people's money in unjust taxation on commissions.

I herewith submit the cost of the various commissions:

From 1870 to 1875, inclusive	$715,375
From 1876 to 1881	812,231
From 1882 to 1887	1,240,150
From 1888 to 1898	1,203,156
From 1899 to 1910	2,770,390

In order to give you a fair idea of the great waste of money on commissions appointed by authorization of Congress, I herewith give a statement of disbursements on account of the various commissions of the Government from 1899 to 1910:

Industrial Commission (tariff and trusts)	$323,233
Postal Service Commission	22,000
Canadian Commission	49,000
International Prison Commission	23,439
Bering Sea Commission	700
Commission on Grants of Land in New Mexico	9,994
California Débris Commission	150,284
Merchant Marine Commission	16,838

Coal Strike Commission	$51,000
Extension of Capitol Commission	12,400
International Commission on Navigation	17,822
Printing Investigation Commission	16,436
National Monetary Commission	145,115
Immigration Commission (partly estimated)	851,175
Second Class Mail Commission	10,534
Commission on Business Methods in Post Office Department	78,206
Bonding Companies Commission	10,000
St. Johns River Commission	5,000
Jamestown Tercentennial Commission	32,766
National Waterways Commission	30,000
International Waterways Commission	73,528
Appropriation for Tariff Board:
To June 30, 1911	250,000
To June 30, 1912	400,000
Appropriation for Commission on Change of Methods of Transacting Public Business:
To 1911	100,000
To 1912	100,000
Fine Arts Commission	10,000

MOST COMMISSIONS ARE WORTHLESS.

I say a great majority of these commissions were without pecuniary benefit to the Nation. The reports of a great many of them could have been taken out of some encyclopedia without the useless expense to the taxpayers of the Nation of thousands of dollars for all the actual investigating some of the commissions did. Many of these commissions which finally did report to Congress, after everybody had forgotten that they were in existence, had their recommendations turned down. Out of 28 commissions that have been authorized since 1899, only three or four of the schemes recommended by these commissions have been adopted or enacted into a law.

I think it is time to call a halt in the procedure of appointing commissions for the mere purpose of satisfying the personal whims of a few who see this opportunity to prolong their official lives by becoming members of the river regulation commission. I do not wish to be construed as saying that any particular person has kindled his ambitions for the sake of winding up his official career in a blaze of glory. But if there is any person cherishing such an outcome of the pending appropriation bill, I think it is time for Congress to ponder seriously before changing a definite program in order to encourage a mania for commissions. The mania should be crushed, the sick men thus afflicted should be nursed to a complete recovery, and Congress would begin to get rid of the shackles of the alleged faith-healing commissions.

SOME HAVE HOBBY OF SERVING ON COMMISSIONS.

It has been said that if you desire many things, many things seem but a few, and so we might apply this saying to those who persistently relish the savors of commission membership. I have taken the trouble to make some inquiries on the subject, and I find some interesting facts which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I find that one Member of Congress has already served on at least three commissions. I cite this to you as an example of the extent to which the commission idea can become a fad. The records which I refer to show that this one distinguished gentleman had the distinction of serving on the following commissions:

National Monetary Commission, Inland Waterways Commission, and National Waterways Commission.

Commissions can become so popular in the minds of some that one commission can offer an excuse for the formation of a succeeding commission. Now, following this line of thought, is it beyond the possibility of reason that this proposed river regulation commission would wind up its report with a recommendation that another commission be formed appropriating some more of the Government's millions of currency? As a matter of fact, this very thing was done by the Inland Waterways Commission, one of the commissions above referred to. When the Inland Waterways Commission made its report on May 26, 1908, it recommended the appointment of another commission, which was later authorized in accordance with the recommendation, and was known as the National Waterways Commission. It will be noted upon perusal of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that another distinguished Member of Congress, who, by the way, is the author of the amendment recently introduced in the Senate to authorize the river regulation commission, was also a member of the Inland Waterways Commission.

So we can not deny that commission can suggest commission and that mania for creation of commissions can develop into more mania for creation of commissions. Gentlemen, I say if passion drives let reason hold the reins.

I want to read to you an extract from the report of the Inland Waterways Commission:

We recommend a commission to continue the investigation of all questions relating to the development and improvement and utilization of the inland waterways of the country and the conservation of its natural resources related thereto, and to consider and coordinate therewith all matters of irrigation, swamp and overflow land reclamation, clarification and purification of streams, prevention of soil waste, utilization of water power, preservation and extension of forests, regulation and control of flows of floods, transfer facilities and sites and the regulation and control thereof, and the relations between waterways and railways, and that the commission be empowered to frame and recommend plans for developing the waterways and utilizing the waters, and, as authorized by Congress, to carry out the same, through established agencies when such are available, in cooperation with States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals, in such a manner as to secure an equitable distribution of costs and benefits.

Now, this commission was appointed as recommended. They made their report; and I do not dispute the fact that they went into the matter thoroughly.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

Yet this proposed Senate amendment, devised for the purpose of postponing an appropriation for the rivers and harbors solely, as introduced the other day, contains practically the same wording as the report I have taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. To show you the marked similarity I will read you the amendment introduced by Senator NEWLANDS:

That a commission, to be known as the river regulation commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, two Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, and two Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, is hereby created and authorized to investigate questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, forestry, fisheries, swamp-land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil waste, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of transfer facilities and sites, and to formulate, if practicable, and to report to the Congress, comprehensive plans for the development of the waterways and water resources of the country for every useful purpose through cooperation between the United States and the several States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control, if any, as can be properly undertaken by the United States by virtue of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce by reason of its proprietary interest in the public domain; and to States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portion, if any, as properly belongs to their jurisdiction, rights, and interests, with a view to properly apportioning costs and benefits, and with a view to so uniting the plans and works of the United States within its jurisdiction, and of the States and municipalities, respectively, within their jurisdictions, and of corporations, communities, and individuals within their respective powers and rights, as to secure the highest development and utilization of the waterways and water resources of the United States. Such river regulation commission is authorized, for the purpose of said investigation and report, to bring into coordination and cooperation with the Corps of Engineers of the Army, as a board or boards, the other scientific or constructive services of the United States that relate to the study, development, and control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, and to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, and to consider as a part of its study of a comprehensive plan the continuance of such a board or of such boards, with a view to keeping such services in coordination and cooperation; and such river regulation commission is authorized to appoint as members of such board or boards such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development, constructors, and other employees as it may deem advisable to appoint and employ in connection with the investigation and the formation of plans herein authorized, and to lease offices. And for the expenses of such investigation, organization, and formulation of plans the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated.

Is it economy to suggest the expenditure of more than half a million dollars for this commission, when the provisions are the same in many identical respects as those by which a former commission was guided? Is this commission business going on forever? If we should be so weak as to authorize such a commission, does anyone think that the commission would be able to complete its work with an appropriation of $500,000?

WOULD THROW $500,000 TO THE WINDS.

There is another phase of this question of economy I would like to mention. Suppose, for instance, that I owned a big string of factories for which I was building large additions. Suppose I was cramped for space and general facilities, and my business was suffering every day because of a lack of operating space. Suppose in the midst of my building operations, with the work about half completed, I would suddenly call a halt to building construction, and, to the amazement of my engineers and advisers, say to a half dozen men picked at random, "Here, go and spend $500,000; do what you please with the money, and then bring back a report in writing of what you find out." In the meantime I would be realizing nothing on the investment I had already made on building construction; I would be unable to fill orders for want of facilities to meet the demand of increased business. How long would I last in the business world through such a folly? Is the great work of river and harbor improvement a plaything or a business? Do we want to do in Congress what we would not do if it were our own private business, instead of being the public's business?

Now, the provisions of this amendment for the formation of a commission call for the employment of all kinds of experts. I say most emphatically that the Government has had all the experts that were necessary to carry on river and harbor improvement. Our Corps of Engineers in the War Department are fully equipped, and all men of very extensive talents. You might search the whole world and not do any better.

PARTICIPATION OF COMPETENT CORPS OF ENGINEERS.

The part taken by the engineers of the Army should be too well known to render the enumeration of same necessary; but for the benefit of those who persist in alluding to the appropriation bill as a "pork barrel," when they seemingly do not appreciate that everything is now done absolutely open and aboveboard, I quote you the act of June 13, 1902:

That there shall be organized in the office of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, by detail from time to time, from the Corps of Engineers, a board of five engineer officers, whose duties shall be fixed by the Chief of Engineers, and to whom shall be referred for consideration and recommendation, in addition to any other duties assigned, so far as in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers may be necessary, all reports upon examinations and surveys provided for by Congress, and all projects or changes in projects for works of river and harbor improvement heretofore or hereafter provided for; and the board shall submit to the Chief of Engineers as to the desirability of commencing or continuing any and all improvements upon which reports are required. And in the consideration of such works and projects the board shall have in view the amount and character of commerce existing or reasonably prospective which will be benefited by the improvement, and the relation of the ultimate cost of such work, both as to the cost of construction and maintenance, to the public commercial interests involved, and the public necessity for work and propriety of its construction, continuance, or maintenance at the expense of the United States; and such consideration shall be given as time permits to such works as have heretofore been provided for by Congress, the same as in the case of new works proposed. The board shall, when it considers the same necessary and with the sanction and under orders from the Chief of Engineers, make, as a board or through its members, personal examinations of localities; and all facts, information, and arguments which are presented to the board for its consideration in connection with any matter referred to it by the Chief of Engineers shall be reduced to and submitted in writing and made a part of the records of the office of the Chief of Engineers. It shall further be the duty of said board, upon a request transmitted to the Chief of Engineers by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives or the committee on Commerce of the Senate, in the same manner to examine and report, through the Chief of Engineers, upon any projects heretofore adopted by the Government or upon which appropriations have been made, and report upon the desirability of continuing the same, or upon any modifications thereof which may be deemed desirable.

The engineers are really the fountainhead of the entire system of river and harbor improvements, and the provisions of the above act which I have just referred to make them so. Furthermore, these engineers are not appointed through political influence. They are the honor men of West Point. In other words, the very cream of the Army Academy graduates make up the corps which have so much to do with the system.

Mr. SPARKMAN, chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, is authority for the statement that three-fourths of the proposed improvements of navigable streams have been completed. Since we have gone so far, it should be our pride and ambition to complete the other fourth as rapidly as possible.

OHIO RIVER RIVER OF ALL RIVERS.

The Ohio River improvements are slightly less than half completed, and this stream should be given especial attention in view of its great importance. While on this subject I wish to quote to you portions of a report made by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, which emphasizes the importance of the Ohio. After referring to the recommendations for the improvement of the Ohio River by locks and movable dams so as to secure a depth of 9 feet as a project worthy of being undertaken by the United States, the engineers say:

In making this recommendation the board realizes that it is suggesting a plan for river improvement on a scale not hitherto attempted in this country, but it believes that there will probably be in the near future a popular demand for the improvement of several streams on such a scale. On account of the large commercial development of its shores and its connection with the lower Mississippi, now maintained in a navigable condition, the Ohio River is, in the opinion of the board, the one river of all others most likely to justify such work. Furthermore, it should be noted that by authorizing the construction for 9-foot navigation of 14 locks at various parts of the river Congress has already practically entered upon such a system of improvement.

This report was made October 18, 1907. Since that time 17 olcks and dams on the river have been started, and if no hindrance is placed in the passage of the appropriation bills every lock and dam needed to assure a navigable stage on the river the year round, from Pittsburgh to the mouth, will have been started by the year 1920.

LETTERS FROM EVANSVILLE BUSINESS FIRMS.

I wish to read three letters to the River and Harbor Committee received from representative business firms of Evansville, the second city in population in Indiana, and the fourth along the Ohio River:

[Letter of the Southern Stove Works, of Evansville, Ind.]

We are large shippers by water from Evansville, and it is a serious question with us very frequently to use that highway, because in low stage of water we are unable to ship goods by river, lose business thereby, as we are obliged to ship them all by rail at an increased freight rate, and our business has been seriously injured by the fact that during so many months of the year we are unable to avail ourselves of river shipments by reason of the low stage of water, and we earnestly beg you to do all you can to increase that stage of water by action of Congress.

[Letter of the Standard Brick Manufacturing Co., of Evansville, Ind.]

We are very glad to see that prospects are becoming brighter for an improved river, and that we may be hopeful that the day is not far distant when the Government will recognize its importance to this district and will come to our rescue.

As to significance of this proposition as it relates to our industry, permit us to call your attention to the fact that the high freight rates on the railroads limit our selling territory to less than 100 miles, and wherever a point can be reached by river we can get a much lower transportation charge by water. Now, it so happens that always when the building season is at its highest point the water in the river is at the lowest, and, in fact, during the summer months, the time when we have to depend upon placing our output, the river has been so low that it was unsafe to start off a barge load of brick, and no boatman could be induced to undertake it.

Until such time as that a 9-foot stage is given us we will be deprived of a lot of business, and many people in the surrounding territory who have no railroad connections will be seriously handicapped in building operations during the best time of the year, or if they succeed in getting their material over the railroad are obliged to pay much higher transportation charges.

[Letter of the I. Gans Co., wholesale dry goods, of Evansville, Ind.]

We write this letter to emphasize the great needs for navigable stage of the Ohio River, such as the Ohio Valley Improvement Association is laboring so incessantly to accomplish. We, of course, write from our standpoint here in Evansville

Every year navigation closes for several months, and many towns far away from railroads that run out of Evansville turn their trade away to other cities; in many instances some of our customers order by rail, the nearest station to them, but in every instance we have to divide the cost of freight; thus, it is expensive to us, yet we are forced to do so to hold the trade.

Two years ago we made a shipment amounting to over $100; goods were put off at a certain landing, but on account of the low water the boat was naturally irregular in reaching said landing. In consequence, our customer was not at the landing when boat reached there; however, the goods were put off at our risk and were stolen.

If we had a good stage, boats could run regularly and there would be no risks to assume, because parties could be on hand at such landings to take charge of goods. We also find that our trade order all their goods by river, even where railroads touch those places, on account of the cheaper rates.

When the river gets real low, permitting only small craft like gasoline boats to navigate, we frequently haul goods to the wharf, but have to haul it back again, as the small boats can only carry so much. This improvement of our river does not mean a benefit to Evansville only, but the whole country is interested. Shipments from northern cities for points on Green River come to Evansville, but are delayed until sufficient water will permit larger boats to carry goods.

Locks and dams on Green River make that stream navigable at all times, yet two years ago we could not even ship to points on Green River owing to the extreme low stage in front of Evansville. We consider that the improvement of our rivers is as important as the Panama Canal.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATERWAYS AND NAVIGATION.

A better idea of the importance of the Ohio River is gained from the following extract from the report of the examination of the Ohio R'ver, as made by the Board of Engineers of the War Department:

The waterways connecting the Great Lakes have enormously developed in the past 10 years, but the railways have reaped the benefits. Neither the Canadian canals down the St. Lawrence River nor the Erie Canal across New York State have responded to the growth of the Lake commerce. The success of the Great Lakes as a means of transportation has not resulted from competition between the great systems of transportation and outside parties, but from the utilization of the waterway by the railroads themselves, which have expended millions of dollars to improve their terminal facilities and have established the large fleets which navigate the Lakes.

But the great cause of the failure of waterways as a means of transportation in the United States is that they heretofore have not generally followed a commercial route, but have led from nowhere to no place. The river systems of the country flow generally in a southerly direction, while the trend of commerce has been east and west. Until within the last 10 years a railroad running north and south was generally a financial failure. River systems have followed the same laws; their commerce has been confined to the products on their immediate banks, and that of not sufficient amount to justify their permanent improvement.

The board is of the opinion that conditions are exceptionally favorable for the future development of commerce on the Ohio River. The river now maintains a traffic of over 9,000,000 tons in competition with railways. This commerce appears to be slowly increasing, and its growth appears principally in other products than coal.

Pittsburgh is the center of vast manufacturing industries, and is rapidly developing. Within the Pittsburgh district are located 324 factories having water communication either by the Allegheny, Monongahela, or Ohio Rivers, and which can as readily ship by water as by rail. The freight entering and departing from this district by river and rail in 1896 was estimated at 60,000,000 tons, and in 1906 at from 115,000,000 to 122,000,000 tons. At Pittsburgh, among the principal manufactured articles are iron and steel ingots, billets, blooms, boilers, structural steel and iron, steel rails, and other material which at other localities become the raw material of their factories. Such items require cheap transportation, and will seek a water route if assured of certainty of delivery. Large manufacturing centers also exist at Wheeling, Ironton, and other points on the river. Cincinnati, Louisville, and Evansville are business centers of great activity, and a rapid commercial growth is occurring at St. Louis, Memphis, New Orleans, and other localities on the Mississippi River. The distances between these localities are sufficiently great to justify a transfer in transit even at considerable expense.

The board believes that a large commerce is reasonably prospective if these commercial centers are connected by a waterway which will permit the certainty of transportation which is found on existing railroads and that this certainty will be attained by the works proposed in the report.

The General Government has expended large sums in improving the various tributaries of the Ohio. The utility of these improvements is dependent on the navigability of the main stream. The proposed improvement of the Ohio River will create a vast system of water communication penetrating one of the most populous and prosperous sections of the United States. Even in its unimproved condition the river has a marked effect on rail freight rates, the cheap rates quoted in the report as prevailing between New Orleans and Louisville, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh being directly traceable to its influence. Its effect on rail freight rates will be greatly increased if the proposed improvements are carried out.

For these reasons the board is of the opinion that the improvement of the Ohio River by locks and movable dams so as to secure a depth of 9 feet, as recommended in the report of the special board, is worthy of being undertaken by the United States.

In making this recommendation the board realises that it is suggesting a plan for river improvement on a scale not hitherto attempted in this country, but it believes that there will probably be in the near future a popular demand for the improvement of several streams on such a scale. On account of the large commercial development of its connection with the lower Mississippi now maintained in a navigable condition the Ohio River is, in the opinion of the board, the one river of all others most likely to justify such work. Furthermore, it should be noted that by authorizing the construction for 9-foot navigation of 14 locks at various parts of the river Congress has already practically entered upon such a system of improvement.

ADVANTAGE OF WATER OVER RAIL TRANSPORTATION.

One important difference between transportation by rail and by water lies in the control of the highway. The railroad itself is an essential part of the outfit of the railroad company. Conditions peculiar to river traffic seem to make it necessary for the same authority which directs the movement of trains to control the roadway. Often one railroad company uses a part of the tracks of another, but such use is regularly the result of mutual agreement. Waterways, on the other hand, are maintained and controlled by an authority entirely distinct from that which directs the movement of the boats. The Federal Government has control of the navigable waters of the United States and prescribes regulations for their use. A navigable water is a public thoroughfare—as free to all persons as is a country road or a city street—and subject only to the regulations prescribed by the National Government.

With these natural resources we should never show the least disposition to discourage improvements that will benefit commerce. The Department of Agriculture is authority for the statement that one of the greatest hindrances to the growth of river traffic in the Mississippi Valley has been and is low water. I quote from the Agricultural Yearbook:

The low-water seasons do not come at regular intervals and are not uniform in length. The uncertainty of river service has been one of the influences diverting to railroads all but a very small fraction of the carrying trade of the valley.

Some of the rivers of this region are more favored than others in regard to navigable water, but even the Mississippi itself sometimes fails to give free passage to traffic. One barge fleet in the grain service about 1900 or 1901 is said to have consumed nearly two months in making the round trip between St. Louis and New Orleans. The regular time was about one week. Regularity of navigation on the Mississippi and its large tributaries for towboats and barges such as were used a few years ago between St. Louis and New Orleans would add greatly to the transportation facilities of the Central States. Even a larger load could be carried on a tow on these streams than is now carried by one of the largest freight steamers on the Great Lakes. Many smaller streams of the valley could be made highways for the regular movement of farm produce and other freight if the channels were kept navigable throughout most of the year. The interruption in winter on account of ice, occurring each year at about the same season, would not be a serious drawback. Irregularity of seasons of navigation is and has been one of the most serious obstacles to water transportation on these rivers.

Where navigation is regular, as on the Great Lakes and a number of tidal waterways along the seacoasts of the United States, boat traffic has continued to grow in spite of increased railroad facilities. But on our greatest river system, with its thousands of miles of steamboat routes, conditions are in striking contrast with the marvelous development in other phases of commercial life.

It is to be understood that in some instances improvements of river channels are costly, and some work is done only to be destroyed by the next flood. This is not true of all such work by any means. The great amount of service already rendered to freight traffic on inland waterways by wise improvements has much of promise for the future.

A SECTION RICH IN MANUFACTURING, MINING, AND FARMING.

I hardly think there is a congressional district in the United States with a city of 100,000 population within its borders that is richer in manufacturing, mining, and farming than the district I have the honor to represent, considering the three important items as a whole.

In manufacturing Indiana is excelled by but few States, and the city of Evansville is second in industrial importance in the State, ranking next to Indianapolis.

In agriculture our district abounds and it is my purpose to point out to you just why we take great pride in our importance in that respect.

In mining we occupy a position as the hub of a section of the United States, which, including 24 counties within a radius of 100 miles of Evansville produce the enormous amount of almost 25,000,000 tons of coal per annum.

So, with these three important essentials of production; with 15 railroads and traction lines traversing every section of our district and plying in every direction of the compass, and with the mighty Ohio River to carry the products of the manufacturing establishment and the farm; and last but not least, situated as we are within a few miles of the center of population of the United States, I defy any person to dispute that our future can be painted with a rosy tint.

One could hardly be too emphatic in setting out the agricultural importance of the first district of Indiana. Corn is grown on nine-tenths of the farms; winter wheat is raised on about half the farms, and the city of Evansville is known as the greatest winter-wheat market in the United States. Fruit growing finds a most important place. Ninety per cent of our farms report domestic animals. Eighty-nine per cent have dairy cows. Meat production goes hand in hand with the corn production. A large share of our corn crop is marketed through cattle and hogs.

There are no cheap lands. Markets, transportation, population, and prices for farm products have placed a high price on every acre.

GIBSON COUNTY.

Gibson County is one of the leading agricultural counties of the State. Fruit is grown on a large scale, and I am told there is no county in Indiana which produces more apples. It has extensive coal beds with three veins of good coal. Oil and gas have been found in paying quantities.

POSEY COUNTY.

Posey County has no superior in the production of melons, and hundreds upon hundreds of carloads of these are shipped out every summer; it annually produces the largest yield of wheat of any county in Indiana, is fourth in the State in the production of berries, and the State statistician gives us figures which show that this county leads the State in having the largest number of mules on hand.

PIKE COUNTY.

Pike County is rich in bituminous ore deposits, most of the land being underlaid with fine workable veins of from 4 to 9 feet in thickness, producing almost one-third of all the coal mined in the first district. It is rich in fertile lands and one of the most important counties of southwestern Indiana.

SPENCER COUNTY.

Spencer County takes a front rank in the raising of wheat and corn. Tobacco is grown in great abundance. Coal is also mined in this county, and it has the combined essentials of production to make it rank as one of the very highest counties in Indiana in a varied way.

WARRICK COUNTY.

Warrick County ranks as the second county in the State in the production of tobacco, and with Spencer County the first district has two counties producing more tobacco annually than any other congressional district in Indiana. Warrick has four railroad lines bisecting it. The farmers are rich and prosperous. There are only four counties in Indiana which produce more coal than Warrick County.

VANDERBURG COUNTY.

While Vanderburg County has a city of 100,000 population within its boundaries it does not take an insignificant rank in respect to its agricultural products. It produces a large amount of wheat and corn, ranks tenth in Indiana in the production of berries, and fourth in the State in yield of apples.

HUB OF MOST PRODUCTIVE COAL SECTION IN WORLD.

Taking Evansville as the pivotal point, because it is the largest city in the first district and occupies a splendid location on the Ohio River along with other excellent transportation facilities, I herewith present a table computed from figures furnished by the United States Geological Survey, showing the amount of coal produced annually within a radius of 100 miles of Evansville:

	Tons.
South of Evansville, 11 counties	7,160,541
East of Evansville, 4 counties	1,563,192
North of Evansville, 5 counties	8,796,890
West of Evansville, 4 counties	4,598,951
Total, 24 counties	22,119,574

I want to say in further emphasis, and to indicate conclusively that our importance as a coal center is not in the least exaggerated, that in that comparatively small stretch of land above referred to—approximately 200 miles square—is mined as much coal annually as in any State of the Union barring only the output of three States. Judging this coal section, with Evansville as the undisputed center, by the number of square miles, we are not surpassed by any other section of the country.

THE CITY OF EVANSVILLE.

Evansville is the leading city of our district, is the second city in Indiana in population, and is the fourth largest city on the Ohio River, ranking next in importance to Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, and Louisville. There is no other city on the river that is even one-fourth as large as Evansville. This city has often been referred to as the "second Pittsburgh," and some are inclined to believe that the time is not far away when Evansville will equal Pittsburgh in manufacturing importance. No city of its size, or larger, in the United States has a better natural location. It is on the most direct line from the North to the South; is the natural gateway to the South; the greatest volume of traffic, both freight and passenger, from the Lakes to the Gulf and the southeastern coast and in the reverse direction passes through its portals.

RIVER LINES.

Evansville's location on the Ohio River has been the principal medium by which it has attained prominence as one of the best manufacturing cities in the Central West. Six steamboat lines make Evansville their home port, and by these lines all the towns and cities located on the Ohio, Green, Cumberland, and Tennessee Rivers and the greater part of the Mississippi River can be reached. It is the consensus of opinion of rivermen that, with the general improvement of the Ohio River to the 9-foot stage, already begun, and the completion of the Panama Canal, river traffic, which has deteriorated in the last 15 or 20 years because of the inroads of railway lines, will be revivified and the activity that characterized the Ohio River in former years will return. As a distributing point, because of our excellent transportation facilities by rail and water, Evansville is unexcelled.

EVANSVILLE CHEAP SOFT-COAL MARKET.

That Evansville is one of the cheapest soft-coal markets on earth is undeniable. Within the corporate limits of the city alone there are 5 mines and within a radius of 54 miles there are approximately 60 mines. The freight rate from the most distant mine to Evansville is but 50 cents per ton for delivery at industries located on railroad tracks. This condition makes it possible for manufacturers to obtain steam coal at as low a cost as at any other city on earth.

BANKING FACILITIES.

Evansville has 13 banks and trust companies, with total resources of approximately $27,000,000, so ably managed that there has never been a failure. At the close of 1913 Evansville ranked sixty-second among 134 of the largest cities of the country in bank clearings, and in population it was eightieth, in accordance with the United States census of 1910, which was 69,647. Based on the city directory for 1913, the population is 89,105.

The bank clearings of 1913, as compared with those of 1903, showed a gain of 122 per cent.

The clearings for 1913 were $129,075,478.

The clearings for 1903 were $57,091,041.

The following comparative statement of the bank clearings of cities of about the same rank as Evansville clearly attests the claim that this city, in proportion to population, is among the best commercial and manufacturing centers in the United States.

City.	Population, United States, census 1910.	Clearings, 1913.	Rank.
			Population.	Clearings.
Akron, Ohio	69,067	$96,120,000	81	75
Canton, Ohio	50,217	77,722,808	109	89
Dayton, Ohio	116,577	122,982,479	65	65
Erie, Pa	66,526	55,564,121	86	99
Fort Wayne, Ind	63,933	65,002,707	89	91
South Bend, Ind	53,684	27,388,009	100	116
Terre Haute, Ind	58,157	50,000,000	93	103
Youngstown, Ohio	79,066	82,978,542	67	84

EVANSVILLE AS A MANUFACTURING CITY.

As a manufacturing city Evansville holds high rank, especially in the Central West. The 400 factories manufacture greatly diversified products, and in some of them Evansville is in the front rank, notably in the production of furniture, flour, stoves, plows, brooms, lumber, buggies, beer, steam shovels, pottery, and locomotive headlights.

The average number of wage earners employed in the factories of Evansville is 12,000; the average value of products is $27,000,000 annually; the amount of capital invested is $24,500,000.

An inexhaustible supply of coal, practical freedom from industrial strife, and an excellent supply of labor, together with reasonable freight rates and splendid transportation facilities by rail and river, make Evansville an unsurpassed location for manufactories of all kinds.

So it is that with bright prospects in the lower Ohio Valley, with a river which is a greater asset than the Panama Canal, with our natural advantages second to none in the entire world, with producing powers unsurpassed, the people of our district and adjoining districts are entitled to the benefits of every dollar that the Government can appropriate to make the Ohio River a perpetual avenue of navigation.

In closing I want to state that Congress will never regret its support of the just measure which is now pending. Nor can any kind of criticism detract from the merits of the program for river and harbor improvement. We have gone three-fourths of the way, the experimental stage has been passed, and it is not for us to falter or turn back when the great goal is so near after a century of propagation. [Applause.]

APPENDIX A.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 29, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES LIEB,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: The list of locks and dams in the Ohio River improvement which you left at this office has been checked as requested. It will be noted that under a slight modification of the project Dam No. 42 has been eliminated, and it is possible that Dam No. 40 will also be eliminated some time in the future. The information available in this office is not sufficient to check the name of the town or place near which each dam is to be located. Corrections to the list are indicated by pencil notes, green ink notations, and pasted slip.

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

[1] Locks and Dams Nos. 10, 29, 31, 35, 41, and 48 have contracts covered by authorizations already made and the funds will be provided by future sundry civil acts as needed.

[2] Dams being built by hired labor, all others under contract.

2. What will be done with funds carried by sundry civil bill?

The sundry civil act carries $4,176,000. No allotment of these funds has been made as yet, so it is not possible to tell just how long they would enable the work to go on. All payments under existing contract obligations will have to be arranged for first, then the balance will be distributed among the dams being built by hired labor, so as to keep them going as long as practicable.

3. What work will be suspended if river and harbor bill fails to pass, and when?

Pittsburgh district.—No work affected by river and harbor bill.

Wheeling district.—All work on Dams Nos. 12, 14, 19, and 20 can continue if sundry civil act passes soon, but second contracts for movable parts, gates, etc., will be deferred. Dam No. 15 will be suspended in incomplete state January 1, 1915. Dam No. 28, hired-labor work will be suspended August 1, 1914, and Dam No. 26, September 1, 1914. Dams Nos. 21 and 22 can not be started as proposed. Dams Nos. 16, 17, and 24, work will not be interfered with.

Cincinnati district.—Dam No. 39 hired-labor work must suspend July 31, 1914; hired dredges on open-river work will have to be released September 1; contracts on Locks and Dams Nos. 29, 31, and 35 can continue if sundry civil act provides cash to cover contract authorizations.

Louisville district.—All continuing contract work provided for in sundry civil act; Dam No. 43, hired-labor work will suspend September 30, 1914.

OHIO RIVER—LOCKS AND DAMS.

Suspension of work by hired labor on this project will be necessary at an early day, as well as postponement of beginning construction of additional locks and dams, unless further appropriations are made available for the prosecution of this project, which is to be completed within a period of 12 years

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, July 28, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES LIEB,
United States House of Representatives.

SIR: 1. Referring to your recent inquiry in regard to commercial statistics of the Ohio River, I have the honor to inclose herewith a tabular statement of the commerce of the river for the calendar year 1913.

2. With reference to the method employed in the collection of commercial statistics of the Ohio River, the district officer at Cincinnati in a recent report stated as follows:

"Prior to 1912 the commercial statistics of the Ohio River were collected at the close of each calendar year from all boats plying on the Ohio River.

"In March, 1912, the Ohio River board took up the matter of collecting these statistics and decided that they should be collected at Dams Nos. 1, 8, 18, 26, 37, and 41. The reports are secured by the various lockmasters and sent to this office each month, where they are tabulated. In addition to these, an effort is made to secure reports from boats operating in pools between movable dams and not passing a lock and dam.

"Pursuant to this action of the Ohio River Board, authority was obtained for the printing of the form (E. D., 79009/45), a copy of which is inclosed herewith, and instructions issued for the collection of the statistics (copy herewith). The necessary stationery, supplies, etc., were furnished the different lockmasters in March, 1912, and the collection of the statistics was not commenced until April, 1912, it not being practicable to collect them for the months of January, February, and March, 1912.

"The aggregate tonnage of 8,618,369, short tons may possibly contain a duplication, but this is considered to be offset by the amount of freight not reported by a number of boats not reporting which do not pass a lock. It may be possible that there may be some duplication in the case of packet boats which are required to report at each lock, but as their traffic is local and they are constantly taking on and putting off freight, it is considered proper to give each lock credit for freight on board when passing through.

"It will be noted, however, that boats with through tows are required to report only at the first lock through which they pass. In some instances, however, this is not done until the next lock is passed, but, so far as known, there is no duplication in this respect.

"The tonnage reported as passing a given lock and dam includes that both through the lock and the navigable pass.

"In general it may be stated that the statistics collected of Ohio River traffic have been so unsatisfactory in the past that the Ohio River Board considered it advisable to take up the matter, and the above-described method is the result of their study. The statistics are tabulated and reported only by this office instead of by the various offices in charge of Ohio River works, as heretofore done. An exception is the case of Dam No. 41, Louisville, Ky., where statistics for fiscal year are collected. It was considered that it would be asking too much to require boats to report at each lock, and those selected are aimed to secure the traffic on the river, and particularly that coming from the various navigable tributaries."

3. There is also inclosed herewith a statement showing the status of the slack-water improvement of the Ohio River, April, 1914.

Very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, before my friend from Indiana takes his seat I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. LIEB. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. As a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, can the gentleman give the House any information as to what progress the river and harbor bill is making at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. LIEB. The bill is over there, and it seems like it is asleep. There is an amendment pending trying to put it to sleep, which proposes to create a commission to do away with the great work that is going on in various rivers and harbors, and should the amendment be passed in that shape many contractors who now have projects in course of construction throughout the country will be financially ruined.

Mr. GOULDEN. I thank the gentleman, and feel that it is a very serious matter. I think the bill ought to pass, and I trust the Senate will speedily pass it. Some of the unfounded charges occasionally heard as to this bill being a pork-barrel measure should not influence anyone. It is a just and honest bill, and I appreciate the efforts of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB] in calling attention to this important matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question on which I was speaking a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the resolution passed a while ago. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF ARTICLES OF FOOD, ETC.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution relating to alleged boosting of prices of foodstuffs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House of Representatives information as to whether the prices of articles of food necessary to the health and well-being of the American people have been arbitrarily advanced in the home markets on the pretext that the high prices of such articles are the result of the European war.

Second. Whether the manipulation of values by speculators is resulting in unjust and unwarranted advances in the prices of foodstuffs in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not hear the first part of the resolution. Does it provide for an investigation by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. DONOHOE. That would be satisfactory to me, but it would not be to the other gentlemen who present the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. MANN. No; I will not.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT CALENDAR.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded and the Clerk will report the first bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE STATE OF OREGON.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 49) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed by without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to pass the bill by without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10848) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the disposition and sale of lands known as the Klamath Indian Reservation," approved June 17, 1892.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is not present and I do not see anybody from that committee, so therefore I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. RAKER. Before doing that, the gentleman has not any objection to the bill, has he?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at all, but the Committee on Indian Affairs, or the chairman, was to report a substitute bill, and there has been no action by the committee, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may go over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16172) to give the consent of the Congress for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near New Orleans, La.

The title of the bill was read.

The committee amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

RESTORATION OF HOMESTEAD RIGHTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15983) to restore homestead rights in certain cases.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Illinois have an amendment he would suggest which would be satisfactory to him? I had intended to consult with the gentleman for a week or two in reference to this matter.

Mr. MANN. I have not an amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman have any objection to letting it be passed over?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill retain its place on the calendar and be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NINTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF THE WORLD'S PURITY FEDERATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 271) authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Ninth International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of San Francisco, State of California, July 18 to 24, 1915.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and respectfully requested to appoint delegates to attend and represent the United States at the Ninth International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of San Francisco, State of California, July 18 to 24, 1915.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "fifteen," at the end of line 8, add the following:

"Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said congress."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests Members who have already made up their minds to object to any one of these bills to object when the title is read. In that way business will be expedited very much.

FEDERAL BUILDING SITE, OLD TOWN, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4651) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the trustees of the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, of Old Town, Me.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant, relinquish, and convey, by quitclaim deed, for and in consideration of $300 cash, to the trustees of the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, a corporation duly existing under the laws of the State of Maine and having its principal place of business in Old Town, Penobscot County, Me., a certain portion of a lot of land situated in Old Town, county of Penobscot, State of Maine, acquired from Nellie E. St. Lawrence under decree of condemnation given by the circuit court of the United States for the first circuit, begun and held at Portland, within and for the district of Maine, on the third Thursday of September, to wit, the 21st day of September, 1909, as recorded in Penobscot registry of deeds, volume 819, page 196, described and bounded as follows: Begin at a bolt marking the northeast corner of the said Nellie E. St. Lawrence lot, thence along the west line of the Bangor & Aroostook Railroad location 82.89 feet to a bolt; thence in a westerly direction 30 feet to a bolt; thence in a southerly direction 10 feet to a bolt; thence in a westerly direction 7.09 feet to a bolt; thence in a northerly direction in a line which shall be a continuation of the east line of the lot of land also acquired from Fred E. Allen and Thomas Murphy by the said decree of condemnation first referred to, to the north line of the said Nellie E. St. Lawrence lot; thence along the said north line to the point of beginning, meaning to convey all of that portion of the Nellie E. St. Lawrence lot as lies east of a line drawn in continuation of the east line of the Fred E. Allen and Thomas Murphy lot from a bolt marking the northeast corner of the said Fred E. Allen and Thomas Murphy lot to the north line of the said Nellie E. St. Lawrence lot, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the figures "$300" and insert in lieu thereof the words "46 cents per square foot."

Page 2, line 9, strike out all after the word "bolt," down to and including line 25, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "in the west line of the Bangor & Aroostook Railroad location, which bolt is located 61.39 feet from the bolt marking the northeast corner of the said Nellie E. St. Lawrence lot, thence along the said west line of the said Bangor & Aroostook Railroad location in a southerly direction about 21½ feet to a bolt marking the northeast corner of a lot of land owned by the trustees of the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, Old Town, Me.; thence in a westerly direction, along the north line of said lot owned by the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, 30 feet to a bolt; thence in a southerly direction 10 feet to a bolt; thence in a westerly direction 7.09 feet to a bolt; thence in a northerly direction in a line which shall be a continuation of the east line of the lot of land also acquired from Fred E. Allen and Thomas Murphy by the said decree of condemnation first referred to, about 30 feet to a bolt; thence in an easterly direction in a line parallel to the north line of the lot owned by the trustees of the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, Old Town, to the point of beginning, containing 720.9 square feet, approximately, and to deposit the proceeds of such sale in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GUERNSEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INCORPORATION OF LANDS IN PIKE NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15534) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Pike National Forest.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

During the reading,

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Senate passed a duplicate of this bill, and it is on the calendar as No. 269. It is identical with this bill, and I would like to ask permission to have the Senate bill considered in place of the House bill. The House Committee on the Public Lands has reported the Senate bill to the House, and I have put it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It is identical with this bill, and incorporates some land and puts it into the Pike National Forest.

The SPEAKER. Which calendar number is it?

Mr. MANN. It is Union Calendar, No. 286.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to consider the bill S. 5198 in lieu of the bill which the Clerk was reading, being of similar tenor. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is intended to be accomplished by this bill? As I recollect, my friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has frequently entertained the House with very severe observations on the subject of the great amount of territory in Colorado which was embraced in forest reservations.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. MANN. And he denounced the Government, and especially the eastern portion of the country, for having had this done. Now, the gentleman turns up with two bills to increase the national forests. Now, tell us why.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, I am frank to say that I very much disapprove of adding to forest reservations on general principles. Colorado is one of the six States in which no reserve can be added to without an act of Congress. About two years ago I had a bill to create for Denver a park embracing about 17,000 acres of Government land out in the foothills, 10 or 25 miles west of the city. The land is utterly worthless. It has some little scrub piñon and cedar trees on it, and is cut up with canyons mostly. It has laid there unoccupied for 50 years, with nobody desiring to take any of it, and they probably never will. But the city desired to build some automobile roads out through that territory and beautify and spend some money upon it, and I introduced a bill to grant this land to the city. I met with opposition in the House. Some Members thought it was too large, and then the city came and asked the Forest Service if it would not approve of putting about half of this land into the forest reserve, and the Forest Service people are willing to take it. They say it will not add any more cost to the Government to supervise it. And so the city asked Senator THOMAS, of Colorado, and me to introduce these bills, putting a portion of this land into the Pike National Forest and selling the rest of it to the city. This bill puts about 7,000 acres of that land into the forest reserve. It is vacant land, and has no possibility of coal or oil or anything else on it.

I introduced this bill at the request of the city of Denver, waiving any natural sentiment I have in opposition to the general principle of withdrawing and hermetically sealing up from entry the public domain. But this land is so worthless that if the city will spend some money on it and utilize it, I am anxious to assist it in doing so. I am asking for this legislation to help make more attractive our beautiful capital city. That is my answer to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a peculiar situation. For a number of years the gentlemen from Colorado, and other gentlemen in States similarly situated, have denounced in unmeasured language and in every form of the use of the English language they could conceive of, the establishment of these national forests, and have frequently called to the attention of Congress the fact that most of the land incorporated in the national forests would not grow trees. Frequently I have heard my distinguished friend from Colorado say that they covered desert territory in the forest land; that they can not grow a tree there. Yet, as time goes on even our friends from Colorado become converted to the idea of increasing the national forests by adding land to a national forest where the gentleman says a tree will not grow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did not say a tree would not grow on it. I said there was no timber or at least no appreciable amount of merchantable timber on it. That is what I meant. There are a few trees on some of it.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman said.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The land can not be reforested, but it does have some trees on it.

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the General Government spending a little money to aid the city of Denver in making a beautiful piece of scenery.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Government will not have to spend any money.

Mr. MANN. The Government will not have to spend any money, but of course it will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The city will have to spend the money.

Mr. MANN. We have heard that before. We know the cities do not spend money in national forests to any extent. I am willing to have the Treasury help build an automobile road there in the hope that some of our friends now in Europe, who wish they had stayed in America, will in the future, when they want to make a trip, go out to Colorado and see beautiful scenery there——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I hope they will come.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Rather than go to the other side and see less beautiful scenery.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois, that my objection has always been to putting into the forest reserves lands that are agricultural or grazing lands and that would make homes for people. This is not that character of land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the request, Mr. Speaker? Simply to have the Senate bill read instead of the House bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. To have the Senate bill considered in place of my House bill, H. R. 15534, which is a duplicate of it and they are both on this calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve the right to object to the passage of the Senate bill, but I do not object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands in the State of Colorado, hereinafter described, to wit:

In township 5 south, range 71 west, sixth principal meridian: West half of southwest quarter, section 20; southeast quarter of northeast quarter, east half of southeast quarter, northwest quarter of southwest quarter, section 28; east half of southeast quarter, southwest quarter of southeast quarter, section 29; west half of northeast quarter, southeast quarter, south half of southwest quarter, section 31; northeast quarter, west half of southeast quarter, southeast quarter of southeast quarter, south half of northwest quarter, northeast quarter of northwest quarter, southwest quarter, section 32.

In township 6 south, range 71 west, sixth principal meridian: North half of northwest quarter, section 5; west half of northeast quarter, west half of southeast quarter, east half of northwest quarter, northwest quarter of northwest quarter, east half of southwest quarter, section 6; northwest quarter of northeast quarter, northeast quarter of northwest quarter, section 7.

In township 4 south, range 72 west, sixth principal meridian: Southeast quarter of northeast quarter, southeast quarter, south half of lots 2 and 3, southwest quarter, including lots 4, 5, and 6, section 19; south half of southwest quarter, section 20; west half of southwest quarter, section 29; south half of southeast quarter, north half of lot 1, all of lots 2, 3, and 4, north half of lot 5, south half of lot 6, section 30; south half of lot 2, all of lot 3, section 31.

In township 5 south, range 72 west, sixth principal meridian: Northeast quarter of northeast quarter, south half of northeast quarter, southeast quarter, southeast quarter of northwest quarter, east half of southwest quarter, section 21; south half of northeast quarter, south half of northwest quarter, west half of southwest quarter, northeast quarter of southwest quarter, section 22; west half of southeast quarter, east half of southwest quarter, northwest quarter of southwest quarter, section 28; south half of northeast quarter, northwest quarter of northeast quarter, southeast quarter, east half of northwest quarter, southwest quarter of northwest quarter, southwest quarter, section 26; southeast quarter of northeast quarter, southeast quarter of southeast quarter, northwest quarter of northwest quarter, northeast quarter of southwest quarter, section 27; south half of northeast quarter, northwest quarter of northeast quarter, northwest quarter, section 28; northeast quarter, section 29; north half of northeast quarter, section 34; west half of northwest quarter, north half of southwest quarter, section 35.

In township 6 south, range 72 west, sixth principal meridian: Lot 1, lot 2, lot 6, northeast quarter of southeast quarter, southwest quarter of southeast quarter, lot 3, lot 4, lot 5, lot 8, west half of southwest quarter, southeast quarter of southwest quarter, section 1; east half of lot 6, all of lot 7, lot 8, southwest quarter, section 2; lot 10, southeast quarter, east half of lot 9, southwest quarter, section 3; northeast quarter, southeast quarter, northwest quarter, north half of southwest quarter, southeast quarter of southwest quarter, section 10; all of section 11; west half of northeast quarter, southeast quarter, northwest quarter, southwest quarter, section 12; north half of northeast quarter, southwest quarter of northeast quarter, northwest quarter, southwest quarter, section 13; southeast quarter, northwest quarter, northwest quarter of southwest quarter, section 14; north half of northeast quarter, northeast quarter of northwest quarter, section 15.

In township 4 south, range 73 west, sixth principal meridian: South half of northeast quarter, northeast quarter of northeast quarter, southeast quarter, east half of northwest quarter, east half of southwest quarter, section 24; total, 9,680 acres, more or less; be, and the same are hereby, reserved subject to all prior valid rights and made a part of any included in the Pike National Forest.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I notice that as the bill was originally introduced, these lands were to be withdrawn from entry, but the committee struck out that provision and placed them in the same category as other lands in the forest reserves which are subject to entry. As I understand, any person can enter upon the land in forest reserves, so far as mining rights are concerned?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And under certain restrictions, so far as homestead entries are concerned?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that it was the opinion of the committee that this land in the forest reserves would be no more sacred than any other forest-reserve land, and it should exclude any possibility of mineral entry or application for homestead right if anybody ever wanted to take a homestead on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not the intention to have this land virtually a part of the park system of Denver?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And do you wish it to be subject to entry when it has become a part of the park system of Denver?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The committee did not think it would be a good precedent for us to make to place 7,000 acres of land in a forest reserve so that that should be more sacred or give additional rights that other forest reserves did not have. So far as the committee was concerned, we thought the city of Denver would be willing to accept that condition as prescribed in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is still subject to filing under the mining laws and as homesteads if there are any agricultural lands there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir. The city is willing to take its chances, and they have already expended several thousand dollars in building automobile roads up to this ground.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Is all of this land the property of the United States Government? Are there any private lands included in this?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No private lands are included in this bill.

Mr. BRYAN. On line 16 of page 4 the property is put into the forest reserve, subject to all prior valid rights?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman knows that some of the most glaring frauds that have been perpetrated with reference to the forest reserves and to private lands have been by incorporating private lands into forest reserves and then through lieu-land certificates private owners have been enabled to go on other Government land and get good land for their worthless land which was out in forest reserves. Now, I am a little bit suspicious, until I hear from the gentleman from Colorado on the subject, of putting this land into a forest reserve, subject to all prior valid rights, unless I can be assured that it is Government land.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This is a project that the city of Denver has had in mind for several years. The Interior Department and the Department of Agriculture have sent experts out there and mapped every quarter section of this land. They have gone over the ground exhaustively. It has been reported upon time and time again. And this bill is approved by the department. It is something that meets the approval of both the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior, and is in the interest of building up the park system of the city of Denver. I may say that we have adopted all the amendments that they have suggested by the departments. We have complied with their requests in every particular.

Mr. BRYAN. I call the gentleman's attention to the second paragraph of the department's letter, in which it is stated—

> The land proposed to be reserved is shown by such records to be public, with the exception of the southeast quarter northeast quarter and east half southeast quarter section 28, township 5 south, range 71 west, which is embraced in an unperfected homestead entry.

Now, under the construction of the present law, does not the owner of this homestead entry have the right to ask for a lieu certificate? Is not that law still operative?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I will tell the gentleman about that. We have no right to legislate away from anybody any legal rights that they have, and the Secretary of the Interior has insisted that in these private bills private rights must be preserved. I have passed a number of them. I have heretofore passed bills granting parks for about 20 cities and towns in Colorado, and in all of them the department has insisted that if there are any vested legal rights we must exclude them from the bill and preserve them, and I have always gladly done so. This does not give them any additional rights. They have to go ahead, and if they have any rights they must show them and perfect their titles under the existing law; but they can not get any lieu land.

Mr. BRYAN. Would the gentleman object to an amendment to line 3 of page 1 of the bill, so as to make it read "That all lands of the United States in the State of Colorado hereafter described"? Just reserve all lands belonging to the United States Government, but not any lands that do not belong to Uncle Sam.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have no particular objection to that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. If it is wise to put this land in the forest reserve—and I assume it is—all of the land in this compact area should be within the forest reserve, including any tract which may be temporarily claimed. The language of the bill, I will suggest to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] will not affect the right of the homestead claimant one way or the other, but will affect his land in this way, that if he should not perfect his right, when his right lapses then the tract covered by his right becomes a part of the forest reserve. No one else can secure any right.

Now, if it is proper to have the land within the forest reserve, including the land that this location is on, it all ought to be included in the reserve, reserving, of course, to the homestead settler whatever rights he has.

Mr. BRYAN. If the settler goes on it and perfects his homestead, and there may be other tracts besides that——

Mr. MONDELL. There are no others——

Mr. BRYAN. He gets title to the land inside the forest reserve. Then come negotiations to get him out of the forest reserve.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentleman knows that we are putting settlers in the forest reserves—scores of them.

Mr. BRYAN. But we are not giving them title to the land.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course we are giving them title to the land, under the homestead law, every day in the year.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman is mistaken. We are eliminating agricultural land and letting it be homesteaded, but——

Mr. MONDELL. If this did not contain some agricultural land the fellow would not take out an entry.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Colorado will yield, I notice that as the bill was originally introduced the phraseology was "all lands belonging to the United States of America," and the committee struck that out and substituted "all lands in the State of Colorado." There must be some reason for taking that action, and the gentleman's amendment is reintroducing the phraseology of the original bill. I think there must be some reason, based upon the hypothesis of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], that there may be instances of entries here which may lapse.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will notice this, he will notice that in the way the Senate bill is drawn the bill includes and embraces the amendment suggested by the House committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman did not catch the drift of my suggestion. As the bill was originally drafted it was along the line suggested by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], whereas the committee struck that out and substituted "all lands in the State of Colorado." There must have been some reason for it, and I suppose it was the reason advanced by the gentleman from Wyoming, and I suppose it is a good reason.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman the bills?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I have them both.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman will see that the language of the Senate bill is the language that the House committee suggests by way of amendment. That was done, as I understand, at the suggestion of the Interior Department, and we just made an amendment to it. I do not care anything about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there must have been some reason for it. The gentleman still does not grasp my meaning. The gentleman's committee struck out the words "now belonging to the United States of America" and substituted the words "the State of Colorado."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think the land ought to be in the forest reserves, and the bill gives a specific description of the land and then designates it as part of the reserve.

I think it ought to remain the way it is; but, then, I have no special objection. I think the gentleman ought to withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRYAN. I will say to the gentleman that I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I thank the gentleman. It will save having to go back to be concurred in by the Senate. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Now, does the gentleman from Washington want to offer his amendment?

Mr. BRYAN. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "lands," in line 3, page 1, the words "belonging to the United States Government." I understand that language was in the bill and was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It was stricken out by both committees.

Mr. MONDELL. Both committees struck it out.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think it is very important, but both committees thought it was not appropriate, and I ask that the amendment be not agreed to.

I had all of this land together with the land included in my companion bill to this withdrawn from all forms of entry for the purpose of protecting this territory for the city of Denver until this legislation could be enacted. My report upon this bill gives a description of the object and purpose of this measure more in detail, and is in part as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 14, 1914.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: In response to your letter of April 13, 1914, I have this day transmitted to the President two forms of Executive orders for issuance, one reserving, in aid of House bill 15533, the land therein described and proposed to be granted to the city and county of Denver, Colo., for a public park, and the other reserving, in aid of House bill 15534, the land therein described and proposed to be incorporated into the Pike National Forest.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The amendments recommended by the committee are in accordance with the suggestions offered by the Secretary of the Interior. It will appear from the report of the Interior Department that these lands are in a high and rough country; that they contain no merchantable timber and have no value for agriculture or any other purpose that would make them likely to be entered under any of the public-land laws. Being from 8 to 24 miles from the city of Denver, it is self-evident that if these lands had any appreciable value they would have been entered by some one years ago.

The city has already spent a large amount of money in building good automobile roads up to and through these lands, and it is the intention of the city authorities to place improvements upon the lands for the purpose of protecting the scenery and making them a kind of summer outing place for the people of the city and surrounding country, as well as a part of the general park system and drives of the city.

The city has by its charter and by-laws of the State the authority to purchase these lands and to spend large amounts of money toward making them attractive and preserving their scenic beauty from being destroyed. Practically all of the officials and public-spirited citizens of the State generally—and more especially of the city of Denver—are desirous that the city should own these lands, so they may control them and be justified in spending the public money in improving them.

The President has withdrawn from all forms of entry these lands, in aid of this legislation, as well as the land that is included in the accompanying bill (H. R. 15534), placing certain lands in the adjacent Pike National Forest, both of which bills have the hearty approval of the Interior Department and Agricultural Department and the President of the United States.

It is believed by the committee that no higher or better use could possibly be made of these lands than by allowing the city of Denver to take them at a nominal figure and use them for the health and pleasure of the citizens of that city and the public generally who may visit the city.

By chapter 115 of the laws of 1913 the State of Colorado authorized the city and county of Denver to acquire land outside of the limits of said city and county for parks and roads either by purchase or the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

By amendment to the city charter, known as the "mountain parks amendment," the voters of the city and county of Denver, by an overwhelming majority, provided for the accomplishment of the purpose by authorizing a levy of one-half mill per dollar each year for five years on the assessed valuation.

Under the supervision of the commissioner of property and the park commission, eminent landscape architects were employed to work out plans and report same. Their plans and reports were made and adopted.

Several thousand acres of land have been purchased by the city from private individuals and private corporations, and many thousands of dollars have been spent and are now being spent for the improvement of old roads and building new roads connecting the city and its chain of mountain parks. And many more thousand acres are to be acquired from private owners and from the State of Colorado, all to be used for public park purposes. About 200 miles of roads, old and new, are included in the project.

The city of Denver is building shelter houses, interior park roads, and improving natural springs in the areas heretofore acquired, and contemplates further work of like nature as rapidly as possible. The scenic attractions of the region are many and varied. The preservation of the natural scenery and making it easy to reach are commendable. The benefits to health and otherwise to people who may enjoy the scenery and excellent summer climate are inestimable.

The commercial value of the land is slight either for agriculture, mining, grazing, or timber. The fact that it is so near a large city and has never been appropriated for entry under the land laws is strong evidence of this fact. The President has withdrawn the land from entry in aid of this legislation.

It is believed by the committee that no higher or better use of these lands could possibly be made than by allowing the city of Denver to take them at a nominal figure and use them for the health and pleasure of the citizens of that city and the public generally who may visit the city.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think if the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] will stop to consider a moment he will not want to urge his amendment. This is the only effect it will have: If this homesteader perfects his entry, then the status of the tract is in nowise affected by this amendment. He will have a tract of land within a forest reserve. If, however, he does not perfect his entry and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington is adopted, then this tract of land will still be public land within the limits of a forest reserve, and anyone can go upon it and enter it at any time. If it is wise to reserve the lands, they ought all to be reserved, unless this particular settler may want this particular tract. If he does, he gets it in any event, and under the same conditions with or without the amendment. If he sees fit to abandon his right, then if the bill is not amended the land automatically becomes a part of the forest reserve.

Mr. Speaker, just one thing more. There was some discussion here as to the effect of the language in the bill on all of these lands. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asked some questions about an amendment which, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] suggested, put these lands on the same basis and footing as all forest-reserve lands. I think that is not entirely true. I think the word "reserved," at the end of line 15, put these lands in a different category from other forest-reserve lands. Had that word been left out and the word "and," on the next line, left out, so that it read—

And the same are hereby made a part of the Platte National Forest—

Then these lands would have been in the same condition, legally, as other forest-reserve lands; but the use of the word "reserved," in my opinion, will prevent any of them being entered under any law, and, as a matter of fact, I presume that that is a more satisfactory situation from everybody's standpoint, although I think it was not intended by the gentleman from Colorado. But I do think that is what the effect would be. They are not only made a part of the forest reserve; they are also reserved. I think that would prevent their being entered under any law.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, takes a different view in his recommendation, as found in his letter which is a part of this report.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the Secretary does take a different view. I think the Secretary, in taking his view, did not go far enough and did not consider the effect of this particular word.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Secretary merely recommended the striking out of the words "and withdrawn from entry," and did not suggest the striking out of the word "reserved," and stated that that would place the lands in the same category as the lands in the forest reserves generally.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that I would not want to put my judgment against that of the Secretary of the Interior on land matters, but the gentleman knows that the Secretary of the Interior does not write all the letters that are signed by him.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would certainly want to put the judgment of the gentleman from Wyoming against that of the subordinate who may have written this letter.

Mr. MONDELL. Knowing that the Secretary did not write the letter but that somebody else did, I feel that I am not criticizing the Secretary. I have no disposition to do so; but I think whoever wrote the letter did not take into consideration the fact that the word "reserved" might be held to have the very effect that the other language proposed to be stricken out has.

Mr. STAFFORD. I appreciate the significance of the gentleman's criticism.

Mr. MONDELL. And I see no objection to it. As long as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] does not object, no one else will. I shall offer no amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Bryan:
Page 1, line 3, after the word "lands," insert the words "of the United States Government."

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask that the similar House bill, H. R. 15543, be laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask that the similar House bill, H. R. 15543, be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House bill of similar tenor will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING SITE, VINELAND, N. J.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16642) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to disregard section 33 of the public buildings act of March 4, 1913, as to site at Vineland, N. J.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to disregard that portion of section 33 of the public buildings act, approved March 4, 1913, which requires that the Federal building site selected at Vineland, N. J., shall be bounded on at least two sides by streets.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER] who introduced the bill, a question in reference to this Vineland Federal building site.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, during the temporary absence of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER], I have been requested to look after this bill.

Mr. MANN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to ask any questions.

Mr. MANN. I should like to know why the gentleman proposes to have us disregard a section of the statute?

Mr. PARK. That provides for a street on each side of the building. This is to disregard that and to select a lot in a block with the building facing one street. The choice of the citizens almost unanimously—the patrons of the office—is for this particular lot. The Secretary of the Treasury has suggested that the provision be waived.

Mr. MANN. I see; but here we have a law which I do not think there is very much sense in, providing for 40-feet space on each side of a public building when it is erected. And now, when some gentleman wants to disregard that, I think he ought to give some very good reason for it, although I would prefer to repeal the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the gentleman is acquainted with the locality which this bill affects?

Mr. PARK. No; I have only the statement of the gentleman who is interested in it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a very small community, with but one main thoroughfare running through it. It has a very limited extent. When I read the report it struck me as being rather unusual that they could not find some lot in a little Jersey sand-lot community like that that did not have two sides to it. I thought at first it might be that the adjoining properties on either side of the selected site were to profit by the air space. I suppose everybody who has ever gone to Atlantic City knows where Vineland is. It is just across the meadows from Atlantic City. I suppose the population is not more than two or three thousand. It is just one of those little villages in the grape-juice district. The population may have increased rapidly since grape juice has become popular.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state to the gentleman that the report of the agent of the Treasury Department who went and looked at the lot is that this is much the most available lot. It is a lot desired by the people, and the agent himself says that it is best, an inside lot. I have never been there and have never seen the place, that I know of. I never have been to Atlantic City.

Mr. STAFFORD. What! The gentleman has never been to Atlantic City?

Mr. BURNETT. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's education has been seriously neglected.

Mr. BURNETT. There is no doubt of that, but I have had other fish to fry and could not waste time in visiting Atlantic City, or any other summer resorts. My understanding is that Vineland is a small town, and the agent of the Government recommends this as the most available and best lot, and the Treasury Department thinks that this requisition ought to be waived, a requisition which requires that there should be two sides of the building on streets. I did not report this bill, and hence I have not kept it in my mind as well as I would if I had reported it, but my recollection is that the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER] was that it was a small town; that this is right in the business part of the town; that it would, perhaps, be inconvenient to the business section of the town to secure a lot as available or as good as this, with two sides exposed to the street.

Mr. STAFFORD. The present law requiring an air space of 40 feet on either side of the proposed building would still be in effect?

Mr. BURNETT. It is only that part of the law which requires that it will be at least on two streets.

Mr. STAFFORD. But we have another law that requires that there shall not be any building within 40 feet of either of the building lines of the public building. That law would still be in effect. This bill will require a much larger lot, if not on the corner, so far as the street frontage is concerned, than it would for a corner lot.

Mr. BURNETT. That might be true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here are 80 feet. That must be very valuable property right there in this city or village or community where they have merely one business street, the length of one ordinary city block, where the public building is recommended to be located.

Mr. BURNETT. Those were the reasons, as I remember, that were presented to the committee and that controlled the department in recommending this to be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is acquainted with similar communities where, naturally, the business people would like to have the post office located on the business thoroughfare; but if we are going to pursue that policy we should repeal the law in connection with these cases requiring that there should be 40 feet of air space on either side. Otherwise you are giving to the adjoining property owners a great advantage in air or light space.

Mr. BURNETT. I think the Government could not take the land adjoining for this space without paying for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It gives them a benefit for which they pay nothing.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they do not pay for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the Government is giving to these owners 40 feet of air and light space.

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no; the Government is taking that for its own building.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if it were on the corner it would not need 40 feet on either side.

Mr. BURNETT. That is true; and that is the reason the law was passed, no doubt. I should not be in favor of repealing the law, and yet exceptions ought to be made.

Mr. STAFFORD. I regret very much that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER] is not here so that he can give us the real reason; because, as I know Vineland, it is a small community, and there should be some good reason advanced why an exception should be made in this case.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the purpose of requiring the site to be located with streets on two sides of it, is in order to give added fire protection?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As well as light and air?

Mr. BURNETT. No doubt.

Mr. MANN. What sort of fire protection do they have in Vineland?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know. If the gentleman is making serious objection to it, I will ask that it be passed over without prejudice, because I did not report the bill, and therefore have not kept in mind the conditions as I would have done if I had reported it. I can not give any personal information about it.

Mr. MANN. I think I shall not object myself to the bill, but the question which naturally arises is whether the special agent of the department has been influenced by political considerations in urging that we waive the natural and ordinary requirements.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, of course I know nothing about that.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman would not know about that.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS A SLOUGH, GUNTERSVILLE, ALA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16679) to authorize Bryan and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Bryan and Albert Henry, of Guntersville, Ala., and their assigns be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Guntersville, Ala., said bridge to connect the mainland with Henry Island, in said Tennessee River, in the county of Marshall, in the State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "assigns," insert "when authorized by the State of Alabama."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a Senate bill of similar import which has just come over. If so, I would like to ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate bill in lieu of this one.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman know anything about the number of it?

Mr. BURNETT. No; I do not. I did not know until a minute ago, when I was informed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 5977 be considered in lieu of the one just read. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will be glad to have the bill read so we can see it is identical with the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Bryan and Albert Henry, of Guntersville, Ala., and their assigns, when authorized by the State of Alabama, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Guntersville, Ala., said bridge to connect the mainland with Henry Island, in said Tennessee River, in the county of Marshall, in the State of Alabama, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the Senate bill just read in lieu of the House bill read a few moments ago on the same subject——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see the Senate bill carries the language to which the committee had offered an amendment to the House bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will move to amend by eliminating those words.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, we intended if the House bill was considered to ask that the Senate amendment be disagreed to, and in conformity with that idea I move to strike out——

The SPEAKER. We have not reached that point yet. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of a Senate bill just read? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by eliminating the words "when authorized by the State of Alabama."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Senate bill, page 1, line 4, by striking out the words "when authorized by the State of Alabama."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert after the word "Bryan," line 3, page 1, the word "Henry." It authorizes "Bryan and Albert Henry" and there is some question whether that might mean Bryan Henry and Albert Henry, although I think there is no question how the courts would construe it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "Bryan," insert the word "Henry."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to conform to the text.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the House bill of similar title on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REVOCABLE LICENSE FOR USE OF LANDS NEAR NASHVILLE, TENN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 246, to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a revocable license for the use of lands adjoining a national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit all or any part of the land belonging to the United States and lying outside of and adjoining the north and west walls inclosing the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., to be used for a public road: Provided, That such license or permit shall be issued at the discretion of the Secretary of War and upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, and may be revoked at any time, with or without cause.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in the first place this bill was never referred to the Secretary of War for a report in reference to the park officials. Does the gentleman know whether that was done or not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the bill was referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Well, does not my friend from Tennessee think that the House ought to be in possession of the facts that a bill of this character has been referred to the officials in charge of the park to know what they have to say about it?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman, I happened to report this bill. The report from the War Department was a very short report. The Secretary of War reported adversely to this particular grant of this land, or the use of it. As this bill carried with it no positive right or any positive instructions to the Secretary of War, but after all leaving it entirely within his discretion, in view of the nature of the resolution the Committee on Military Affairs thought that it could possibly do no harm to report and pass it, and let the Secretary of War then finally ascertain what the situation is at Nashville, Tenn., as to this strip of land and the effect of this grant upon the National Cemetery.

Mr. MANN. Well, it may not be so easy for the Secretary of War to fail to yield to pressure upon him as it is for Members of Congress. It seems to me that a bill of this sort, while we are not bound at all by the opinion of the local authorities or the War Department, the bill ought to be referred to them, and we ought to have a statement from them before the House passes it.

Mr. HOWARD. It was referred, and the statement is available.

Mr. MANN. I have not seen it.

Mr. HOWARD. The statement is not a vehement declaration against the passsage of this resolution, I will state to the gentleman; but here is the situation, and I can explain it to the gentleman in a minute: When the wall was originally built around this cemetery, it left a space of about 50 feet lying outside of the wall which has not been used.

Since that time all of this property around the cemetery has been cut up and magnificent residences will soon be in the course of construction.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by magnificent residences?

Mr. HOWARD. Fine residences. That is to say, the very best residential section of the city has been going out that way, so I have been informed, and they are building fine houses, costing from $8,000 to $15,000 each. They have gotten up to this cemetery part of the subdivision. The committee thought this: That rather than to have the garages, the barns, and outbuildings incident to residences back up on the cemetery, it would be much more advantageous not only to the looks but to the property to have these residences fronting this 50-foot road, which is absolutely of no value to the Government. People do not use it; they do not care for it as they should; the strip itself is practically an eyesore, because the attention of the Government is given to the inside of the wall, to the graves of the veterans who are buried there. The committee thought, and I most heartily concur in their conclusion, that it would be much better for the cemetery proper—that is, for its future surroundings—to have these buildings fronting upon it than backing upon it.

Now, one or the other is going to happen. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] knows more about it——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In addition to what the gentleman from Georgia has said, I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the House that this cemetery is located about 6 miles from the central part of the city of Nashville. As the gentleman from Georgia has stated, the town is growing in that direction; that is, the eastern portion of it. These lots adjoining the cemetery have been cut up into lots of an acre, and possibly larger, dimensions. Those who own lots which adjoin the cemetery desire to build their homes fronting the cemetery, for obvious reasons, and will do so if they are permitted to use this unused portion of the Government lands for road purposes, but if they are not permitted to use these unused portions of land for road purposes they will front their lots in the other direction and build their roads in conjunction with those who own the lots in the rear. The gentleman can see it would be much cheaper for them to do so, but they would much prefer to go to the additional expense of constructing the entire road and maintaining it in order to get the view they will get if they can front upon the cemetery.

Now, in addition to that, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] has stated, for some reason when the stone wall was placed around the cemetery the Government authorities left on the west side, I think, 25.5 feet of land on the outside of the wall and on the north side 50 feet of land. That portion of land outside of the wall is not kept in as good condition as the cemetery itself. The gentleman can readily appreciate the fact that from time to time brush is thrown over the wall, weeds grow up on it, and so forth. In other words, it is not a part of the cemetery proper.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman explain the reason why that land was reserved and the wall was not extended out to the extreme boundaries of the Government property?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not. I have asked the question, and no one seems to know. If these houses front in the other direction, as the gentleman from Georgia says, it will mean that stables or barns will be built there adjoining the Government property, and those who have automobiles will put their garages there and their outhouses there, because the gentleman will understand that this is outside of the corporate limits of the city of Nashville, and I do not know whether they will have water facilities there for a while or not. And I can see how it would be very objectionable to the cemetery and those who visit the cemetery to have fronting up on the north and west side of this cemetery a lot of stables, barns, garages, and other outhouses incident to a house or suburban home outside of the corporate limits of the city of Nashville.

Mr. MANN. How many houses have been already constructed there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Unless some house has been constructed within the last month or six weeks, I do not think any has been constructed, because these gentlemen have been waiting to see what would be done.

Mr. MANN. My friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] said they were building magnificent houses.

Mr. HOWARD. I said up to the cemetery property. I said that in the development of this suburban property up to the cemetery they had built splendid residences.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Unless some have been built in the last six weeks, they have not constructed any on the west side. I understand that on the north side of the cemetery houses are going up, but they are fronting in the opposite direction, with the rear next to the cemetery. But I am told that the gentlemen on the west side, who own this land and who desire to front on the cemetery, are delaying the construction of their buildings until they see what is to be done.

Mr. MANN. If this bill should not pass and this property should not be built into a public road, where would the houses front?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am told by Mr. Sanford Duncan, of Nashville, that he intends to front his house to the lots in the rear.

Mr. MANN. What does he front on? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He, in conjunction with those who own the lots in the rear, will build a road between those lots.

Mr. MANN. The property is not subdivided?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The property has been subdivided, but there are no roads.

Mr. MANN. If it was subdivided, was it laid out without any streets at all?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentlemen will understand that these are lots of 3 or 4 acres, with no roads or anything of the sort, and the people who own the lots will get together and construct a proper road. It is not laid out as town lots.

Mr. STAFFORD. Though the width of the proposed dedicated tract is given, it is not stated how long the proposed tract is, so that we can get an idea of the amount of land that is really going to be dedicated.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, it would be a mere guess upon my part. It is the entire length of the cemetery.

Mr. MANN. How high is this cemetery wall?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is probably waist high.

Mr. MANN. You say that on the north side there is about 50 feet on the outside?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but I understand that that will not be asked for, because the buildings are going up.

Mr. MANN. How long is that west side, where it is 26½ feet wide?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I should imagine it was two to four hundred yards; but that is a mere guess on my part.

Mr. MANN. Does my friend from Tennessee really think that anybody will front a house upon a cemetery with a road between him and the cemetery only 26 feet wide, including the sidewalk, I suppose?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, I take it that those gentlemen, if they need more road, will provide for it out of their lands.

Mr. MANN. It is only a pretty good alley, not a road.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will understand that there will be only one sidewalk, and that is in front of the lots.

Mr. MANN. I said "sidewalk," not "sidewalks." Is the gentleman going to insert in here, after the word "hereby," the words "in his discretion"?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment. This is only to give the authority; to grant it, if the Secretary of War thinks it wise to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is only one other question that I wanted to ask. I assume that this road will be maintained by the local authorities?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection, then, to inserting, after the word "road," the language "and maintained by the local authorities"?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. None whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. You know in many instances they have come to Congress, when we have dedicated a road, and asked us to maintain it. This being for the direct benefit of the property owners, they certainly should pay for the continued improvement of it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The owners of the property do not desire to put the Government to any expense whatever.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that line 8 be amended by adding, after the word "hereby," the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WINGO). The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by adding, after the word "hereby," the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that after the word "road," on line 7, there be inserted the following: "and to be maintained by the local authorities."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "road," insert the words "and to be maintained by the local authorities."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PRESERVATION OF MINERAL SPRINGS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12050) reserving from entry, location, or sale lots 1 and 2, in section 33, township 13 south, range 4 west, New Mexico prime meridian, in Sierra County, N. Mex., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it has not been read yet.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the bill be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That lots 1 and 2, in section 33, township 13 south, range 4 west, New Mexico prime meridian, situated in the county of Sierra, State of New Mexico, be hereby set apart from the public domain and reserved from entry, location, or sale for the purpose of preserving for the use of the public the valuable mineral springs located upon said lots.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to control the use of said lots and the waters thereon, and to make regulations for the government of the reservation, and to make such contracts, agreements, and leases as will best preserve them for the use of the public; and all moneys received from such contracts, agreements, and leases by way of remuneration, or from any other source in connection with this reservation, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a special fund to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior for the protection, maintenance, and improvement of said reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSson] if he does not think it would be a good thing to give to the people of the State of New Mexico the right to preserve these springs for the benefit of the public, rather than to unload them on the Federal Government?

Mr. FERGUSSON. This land belongs to the Government of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand. This is the beginning; this is the nose of the camel poked into the tent for a national park. Hot springs are thick out in that western country. If we were to reserve all the hot springs there are we would have a great many more reservations than we have now. If those hot springs are valuable the State of New Mexico ought to take care of them for the benefit of the people. I think the Federal Government ought to grant them to the State of New Mexico if the State of New Mexico wants them. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment, if it were satisfactory all around, to grant this land to the State of New Mexico for the purpose of preserving these springs for the use of the public?

Mr. FERGUSSON. I prefer not to do that.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I realize that the gentleman would prefer to have the Federal Government build up an elaborate resort there.

Mr. FERGUSSON. But the gentleman will observe from the terms of the bill that this is to cost the Government actually nothing.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, nothing; next year something, and the year after more, and thereafter very much. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman allow me to state what I want to state?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. FERGUSSON. This belongs to the Government. It is now, like other valuable hot springs, reserved from entry of any kind by the public—by the people.

It has been so reserved for many years. Heretofore, until within the last year or two, it has been practically inaccessible. These springs are on the west bank of the Rio Grande, a few miles below the Elephant Butte Dam, which is being constructed at a very large expense by the Government, involving the improvement of the road to the nearest railway station, about 16 miles away, on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, and also involving the building of a splendid bridge. Since the springs have become thus accessible the absolutely insufficient accommodations there can not begin to serve the suffering people who come and want to avail themselves of the springs, for the reason that the shacks, tents, and improvements there now are put on by squatters at their own expense. There is no adequate hotel, and there are no adequate accommodations for people who are seeking these springs. The proposition is that the springs are to be cared for and leased under the auspices of the Secretary of the Interior. That is, there are to be leases of certain sites for the building of certain hotels, involving the right to distribute the water through the hotels so that the public can use them. It had better be done by the Government as all such springs are controlled and regulated by the Government. There will be no expense to the Government, as the bill simply provides that whatever surplus comes from the leases shall be turned back by the Secretary of the Interior for further improvements.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from New Mexico says this should be "as all other springs are."

Mr. FERGUSSON. Perhaps I should have said "as many are."

Mr. MONDELL. The Government does not control any hot springs anywhere, so far as I know, except the Hot Springs of Arkansas, and some people think we should not control them. Down in Oklahoma we have also what is known as the Platte National Park where there are some hot springs, which we have been trying to get rid of for years. The gentleman said this would not cost anything.

Mr. FERGUSSON. It will not cost the Government anything.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman proceeds to outline a very elaborate scheme of expenditure. In other words, what the gentleman wants us finally do is to establish down there at these particular hot springs a national park, and have the Government spend a great deal of money there. I will say to my friend from New Mexico that I have had some experience in this matter of hot springs. In the State of Wyoming we have what I understand is about the largest single hot spring in the United States, if not in the world. I think it has been estimated that every man, woman, and child under the American flag could be furnished with a gallon of water per day from the flow of that single spring, which is about 8 feet across and flows up with great force. Years ago I endeavored to have the Federal Government take over that spring and reserve it. Of course the argument was similar to the argument which the gentleman makes, that the reservation of the spring would not cost anything, but we expected the Federal Government to spend money for improving it. A bill passed the House providing for the reservation of the spring and its improvement. The bill failed in the Senate, but I substituted for it a bill under which the United States granted to the State of Wyoming the land on which the spring is located, and the State took over the spring and erected bathhouses and provided for the use of the spring by the people. The State assumed the responsibility and expense, and now we are glad of it. We did not want to do it at the time, but now we are very glad we did, and I am sure the people of New Mexico ultimately would be very much better pleased to own these springs themselves and utilize them for the benefit of the people, than to have the Federal Government take them over and have the people of the country spend their money for the upbuilding, protection, care, and improvement of these local springs in New Mexico, which are probably very excellent springs, but possibly no better than many others scattered over the western country.

I regret to object to a bill of this sort, and yet I feel that it is my duty to object to it, because I do not think we ought to load this expense on the Federal Government or take these springs out of the control of the people. The Secretary of the Interior has exercised the power, under laws now upon the statute books, to reserve the springs. He can do that. The gentleman says that he is doing it, but this official reservation is intended as the beginning of a national park. I should be very glad indeed to join the gentleman in an amendment which would turn these springs over to the good State of New Mexico, in order that that Commonwealth may preserve and improve these springs for the benefit of its people.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman allow me to explain a little further? I am satisfied he will not defeat this bill if he will listen to my explanation. This is absolutely needed. Sierra County is a little mining county and also a large cattle county. The miners and cowboys and inhabitants around that country can not go far away for their health.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me? I think I know the situation there just as well as though I had a picture of it. I know the kind of country it is. We had exactly the same situation in Wyoming.

Mr. FERGUSSON. The gentleman evidently does not know, because I see from what he says he does not know. I think I have the right to ask the courtesy of the gentleman to be allowed to explain.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

Mr. FERGUSSON. These springs have been a blessing to the neighboring sufferers who could get to them. Because of their inaccessibility heretofore more has not been said about them. As I was explaining a moment ago, they are on the west side of the river. The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad runs through that country on the east side of the river, and 16 miles from the railroad the Government has lately built a splendid road to the Elephant Butte Dam and a fine bridge across the river. Five or six miles down the river these springs are located. In consequence of that bridge and the Federal road the springs are now more accessible, and they can not begin to supply the demand for accommodations. They are an absolute blessing to people who are afflicted with certain diseases, and they are also fine for people afflicted with rheumatism, to which the men who work in the damp mines are subject. The springs have great local celebrity. They are absolutely reserved from any use, reserved by the Government because they are mineral springs, and nobody but squatters can locate there, and the accommodations which they have put up are very small and wholly inadequate.

The acreage is only between 75 and 80, as I am told, and the object of this bill is not to get any money out of the Government. The celebrity of these springs, their absolute necessity in that country, make this bill necessary. The ordinary people are crowding in there and this makes it certain that the Secretary of the Interior will be able to make leases that will bring a revenue, which will enable him more and more to improve these springs and make them useful to the whole world. The gentleman is right in saying that there are many fine springs in the Rocky Mountain region, in New Mexico. There is no doubt about that, but they are inaccessible. There are springs that have hot and cold water, there are springs of white sulphur, red sulphur, five or six different minerals that have great celebrity, but they are many miles from any roads. Now, these springs are becoming accessible, so that men will be able to build hotels and distribute these waters and make them useful, and the Government will get sufficient revenue to make it cost the Government nothing. This bill entails no expense, but gives to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to make leases that will tend to make useful the water. The State is a new State. It is heavily laden with expenses, and to turn this over to the State is wholly inadequate at the present time. Later, if it should be found that they are a useless expense to the Government, that will be time enough to insist on turning them over to the State.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is not entirely logical. He says that this is not going to cost the Government anything, but he does not want the State of New Mexico to take them over because the State is not able to pay the cost of their control and improvement.

Mr. FERGUSSON. I did not say that.

Mr. MONDELL. I so understood the gentleman. The State of New Mexico, he said, was a new State, and it was poor, and it was unable to bear any burdens, and now he says that there are no burdens.

Mr. FERGUSSON. We have not the machinery in the State government which will be necessary to take over and supervise these springs.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we had that sort of experience in Wyoming, I will say to the gentleman. We thought we wanted a national park established at our famous Hot Springs. Congress in its wisdom saw fit not to do it. It gave us the land, and our State has proceeded to take care of those springs for the benefit of the people of the State. These springs will be utilized to a very great extent, I hope, and we all hope, and ought to be, and they ought to be cared for, and they ought to be under the jurisdiction of the people of the Commonwealth. I am proposing to object to the bill on behalf of the rights and interests of the people of New Mexico. If the gentleman will give me an opportunity, I will offer an amendment—that is, if he will agree to accept it—under which these lands shall be ceded to the people of New Mexico, with a pledge that they will care for them in the interest of the people. That is the best thing that could be done with them. They entail some expenditure, whether the State has them or the Federal Government. There is no use attempting to disguise that fact. In the long run the people of New Mexico will be very much happier if they control these springs than they will if the Federal Government controls them, and the Public Treasury will be much relieved.

Of course, there will be a few less Federal jobs down in New Mexico, but I believe in State rights, in local control, and I am surprised at a gentleman on the other side getting up here and advocating this kind of federalism. He wants to take these lands in the sovereign State of New Mexico and have them perpetually controlled by the bureaucratic agents of the Federal Government. He wants to take from the people of the sovereign State of New Mexico all of their sovereign right and jurisdiction over these glorious hot springs that are bubbling up in healing purity under the brilliant sunshine of that beautiful country. I am amazed. Let me make this further suggestion to the gentleman, that, as a matter of fact, his reservation by the United States would not have any effect on the use of the waters of the springs. I could go down there to-morrow after this reservation was made and under the laws of his State I could secure control of such waters of those springs as are not now being used. I would have to secure it for a beneficial purpose. I would have to put it to a beneficial use. I would not be able to reserve it from use, but could control its use. The ownership of the land by the Federal Government would not of itself give the Federal Government control over any of these waters. Of course, the Secretary of the Interior after such a bill passed could apply to appropriate those waters, just as anyone else, and he could secure the same rights that others could secure; but the passage of this bill would not of itself reserve those springs to the Federal Government at all.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman be satisfied to offer his amendment after it is taken up for consideration, and let it be voted on? If the gentleman's reasons appeal to the House, I shall bow to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentleman knows that that is not a fair proposition.

Mr. FERGUSSON. I hope the gentleman will not by the power of one vote defeat this bill that is of such urgent necessity to the suffering people of my State.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, answering that suggestion I want to say to the gentleman that he knows just as well as I do that the passage of this bill will not necessarily relieve anybody. The Secretary of the Interior already has those lands under reservation.

Mr. FERGUSSON. But the Secretary is not authorized. I have it from his own lips that this authorization is necessary for him to make leases, to empower men, and give them time enough to justify them in improving the surroundings, to facilitate the use of the water so that they will be of a benefit to the people. He requires the additional authority. It is true that hot springs and mineral springs that are on public lands are reserved, but it takes additional legislation to enable proper contracts for improving them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Interior has not a dollar that I know of with which he could send anybody down there to make these contracts unless we appropriate for it, and the Secretary now has the land reserved, and he can regulate the use of it. There is not anyone going to be denied the use of the waters because we do not legislate. They are being utilized now, and the Secretary of the Interior, no doubt, is in control. The only difference that there would be is that under this legislation the Secretary might make some contracts, wise or unwise, relative to the use of these waters for all time, or for such time as he saw fit. Even if the Secretary were to be authorized to do that, we ought to have some general regulations under which he is to do it. Under the bill he might lease it all to one man or to several men for a long time or in perpetuity.

Here are springs necessary to the happiness and comfort of the people down there. The gentleman would give the Secretary of the Interior the right to lease all of them in perpetuity to some one man. That is what the bill does. I want to give the springs into the keeping of the people of New Mexico.

Mr. FERGUSSON. The gentleman can help us perfect the bill as far as that is concerned, and if the gentleman will let the bill come up he can offer any amendment he pleases.

Mr. MONDELL. I will not object if the gentleman will agree to an amendment whereby these lands are to be obtained by the people of the State of New Mexico. I am a friend of the good people of the State of New Mexico, and I want to see them control these health-giving waters——

Mr. FERGUSSON. Plainly such a bill can not pass and become a law. The whole endeavor of this project is to help those people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman, before he objects, suggest what language he wants to put in, so that I may have a chance to see it?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I would strike out all after the word "hereby"—

Mr. FERGUSSON. Not desiring to delay the consideration of other bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent which Members are anxious to have come up for consideration, I would ask that this bill be passed without prejudice until I can confer with the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objection.

Mr. FERGUSSON. So that I can consider what amendment the gentleman desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to passing the bill over without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARTHOLDT, indefinitely, on account of a death in his family.

To Mr. KIRKPATRICK, for one week, on account of medical treatment.

To Mr. RUBEY, for two weeks, on account of death of his father.

To Mr. DICKINSON, for two weeks, on account of illness.

CONTRACTS UNDER RECLAMATION ACTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 124) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and settle certain accounts under the reclamation acts, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter whenever a contract made under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto shall be suspended on account of default of the contractor and the work is taken over by the Government for completion, either by Government forces or by contract, the Reclamation Service is hereby authorized to pay from the reclamation fund, on account of the contractor and the sureties, for labor actually performed on the work and for all or any part of the materials, plant, and supplies ordered by the contractor delivered at the work and needed therefor, upon satisfactory evidence that the same has not been paid for by or on account of the contractor. Any payment so made by the Reclamation Service shall be charged against the contractor and the sureties, who shall be liable therefor. All claims under this act must be filed with the Reclamation Service within 90 days after the suspension of such contract. All contracts for construction or repair of a public work under the reclamation act or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto shall provide that all books and papers of the contractor regarding the hire and payment of labor and the ordering, purchase, and payment for materials, plant, and supplies shall become available in settlement of claims thereunder. Any claimant who under oath knowingly makes a false claim or a false statement in regard thereto, under the terms of this act, shall be deemed guilty of perjury and subject to the punishment provided therefor by law. A decision of the Secretary of the Interior against any claimant under this act shall not preclude such claimant from proceeding in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 24, 1905, or acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, in order to recover from the contractor or the sureties any amounts claimed to be due him in connection with such contract. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make necessary rules and regulations for the filing of sworn statements of claims and other procedure for determining the amounts due under the terms of this act.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the following words: "That hereafter, whenever a contract made under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902," and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "That whenever a contract for the construction or repair of public works hereafter made under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two, or some one in charge of the bill. What is meant, in the first place, by a contract being suspended?

Mr. RAKER. On account of the confusion, I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. This bill covers what is ordinarily called a mechanics' lien—claims in certain places under the Reclamation Service—and only takes effect whenever the contract shall have been suspended on account of the fault of the contractor, and so forth?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is meant by the term "contract be suspended"?

Mr. RAKER. Under the law as it now exists and as the projects are being developed, where a contract is entered into between the Reclamation Service and the third party to do the work, if he fails to do the work up to the standard, or if he neglects it on account of lack of funds and quits, why, then the Secretary of the Interior suspends the contract and takes over the work and proceeds with it.

Mr. MANN. Does the law say that the contract shall be suspended?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is that in the law?

Mr. RAKER. That is in the contract entered into. In other words, if a man has a contract for digging——

Mr. MANN. I know what the facts are.

Mr. RAKER. When he fails to do the work which is provided in the contract, and when he does not proceed under the rules and regulations, the Government takes over the work and completes it itself and charges up to the contractor the amount of money expended.

Mr. MANN. That is provided in the contract?

Mr. RAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. That is part of the contract that we had.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then plainly the contract is not suspended; it is in operation.

Mr. RAKER. I mean so far as the work between the Government and the man who obtained the contract is concerned.

Mr. MANN. I do not find any such language here. This says when the contract shall be suspended. I do not think the contract is suspended until the work is completed.

Mr. RAKER. It is suspended as to that one feature.

Mr. MANN. That is not what this bill says.

Mr. RAKER. Well, what suggestion has the gentleman to make in reference to it?

Mr. MANN. My suggestion is that this language in here does not carry it out or mean anything.

Mr. RAKER. Well, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Attorney General believe it does.

Mr. MANN. I do not find any evidence of that.

Mr. RAKER. Well, they did not pick out any particular words, but the three departments——

Mr. MANN. Unfortunately that is very often the case, and I will say to the gentleman I am very heartily in favor of some good mechanic lien law that gives any man who furnishes supplies or labor a lien for the amount that is due him. I do not think this does that yet. Now, this statement, "Any payment so made by the Reclamation Service shall be charged against the contractor and securities, who shall be liable therefor." That is, you may after you require the Government to pay the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose there is not that much due to the contractor, or suppose the sureties do not give a bond to that amount. How are you going to make them liable?

Mr. RAKER. Well, I will answer by saying that that would be an unfortunate condition.

Mr. MANN. It would be, but that is what we are dealing with, an unfortunate condition.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say that the Government should not be so negligent, in taking a bond in preparing these contracts, that the laborers or material men who furnish these things for these works should be deprived of their money or their labor, or that which is due them for supplies which they have furnished.

Mr. MANN. That has not anything to do with the principle. How can you make the sureties liable for a greater amount than their bond?

Mr. RAKER. You can not. There is no question about it.

Mr. MANN. This says that you do.

Mr. RAKER. No. You provide in your bond—suppose it is $100,000 and there is a deficiency of $50,000——

Mr. MANN. That is easy; but supposing the bond is $50,000 and the deficiency is $100,000?

Mr. RAKER. They will only pay then 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. MANN. This says the surety shall be liable for the amount that is paid, and directs that the full amount be paid.

Mr. RAKER. Surely they will have to be liable for the amount to be paid. But if the sum is only $100,000 and the amount is $150,000, they would only be responsible for $100,000.

Mr. MANN. But this says they are liable for the full amount.

Mr. RAKER. But if the penalty is only $50,000 and they have expended $60,000, they will only recover $50,000 under the bond.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how it will be with the bonds hereafter. If the law provides that the bondsmen shall be liable, I do not know. They did not know when they entered into the bond——

Mr. RAKER. This would apply to contracts hereafter entered into. That is a provision of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Then it might make bondsmen liable.

Mr. RAKER. That is the provision of the bill, and it is so arranged for that purpose. They could not interfere with contracts already entered into.

Mr. MANN. It makes the bondsmen liable for the full amount regardless of the amount of their bond. At least, it purports to do so.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman will recognize this fact, that in all statutory provisions you must provide that the bondsmen will be responsible for all the damage occasioned. Now, that must be read in connection with the further statute, which provides the penal sum of the bond; and no difference what the damage or loss might be, you never can go over the penal sum of the bond. There is no question about it.

Mr. MANN. What do you put it in the law for?

Mr. RAKER. So as to leave no doubt that he is liable.

Mr. MANN. Now, let me ask another question. Suppose the Government makes a contract and the contractor goes ahead with the work and draws down the money from the Government under his contract, but does not pay his bills? The Government has no notice of that fact. Under the terms of this bill, when he gets the work nearly done, having not paid his bills for either labor or supplies, he defaults; then you provide that the Government, having no notice, shall pay all of those bills?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In response to that, there is something in the neighborhood of 25 per cent always retained on each payment, so it leaves a fairly good sum to pay up such matters.

Mr. MANN. That would depend. Twenty-five per cent is not very much of a sum.

Mr. RAKER. That is the same condition under all contracts.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RAKER. Practically all building contracts. It varies in amount.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is a mechanic's lien law where the man is not required to give notice, if he wants his rights preserved.

Mr. RAKER. If this was a mechanic's lien law, we would agree upon it. There is no such a thing——

Mr. MANN. I think there ought to be a mechanic's lien law against the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Well, until we can get the people to pass such a law, ought we not to give some protection to the poor fellow who works?

Mr. MANN. We ought to give him protection, and at the same time give the Government protection, and there is no reason why a man who furnishes supplies to a doubtful contractor should not give a notice to the General Government at the same time, so that neither the Government nor he can be defrauded by the contractor who wants to defraud both. There is no such provision in here.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is all up to the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior. The entire membership of this House has said so many times that they are satisfied with his judgment. Now, when he takes the bond he can fix the bond at the full amount of the contract price, or even double it, if he wants to, so as to leave an impossibility of a deficit on any kind of material, and the laborers will not lose, or the Government will not lose, if the Secretary of the Interior will fix the bond high enough. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. But the Secretary of the Interior will not and ought not to require a larger bond than he thinks is necessary, because you know when you require an exorbitant bond it means that much more expense charged to the Government. Now, we are dealing with an exceptional case, where the contractor for some reason fails, possibly because the cost of the construction is more than he anticipated or more than the Government anticipated. I am perfectly willing to protect the man who furnishes the labor or supplies, but I do not see any reason why we should not at the same time protect the Government.

Mr. RAKER. How could the gentleman suggest we could protect the Government any more than we have here?

Mr. MANN. I think those people ought to give notice to the Government.

Mr. RAKER. I would see no objection to it. I think it would be a good thing. There is no objection to it.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. In the State of Wyoming there is an excellent mechanic's lien law, that applies to all corporations and ditch-construction companies and railroad companies——

Mr. RAKER. They have that in every State to-day——

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Under which persons furnishing supplies are required to give notice to the parties letting the contract of their indebtedness, and it seems to me there ought to be in this bill a provision such as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests, that would require dealers furnishing supplies to the contractors to notify the Government of the amount of supplies furnished, and the contractor should also be required to furnish to the Government a receipt from merchants and laborers to the effect that he has satisfied their claims before the Government makes the required payments to him.

Mr. RAKER. The bill provides for that.

Mr. MANN. I want to compliment the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] on introducing the bill and getting it reported. It is a step forward. I am in favor of a mechanic's lien on all contracts that the Government enters into. Of course I know that the War Department, in engineering and river and harbor construction, is opposed to it. There was formerly a law on that subject, and it was repealed. I believe there should be a law on the statute books whereby the man who furnishes labor and supplies to the contractor will be protected absolutely if he wishes to be.

Mr. RAKER. That is such a serious question that it might complicate the whole thing. But from observation it does seem to me that we make too many mistakes in taking little insignificant bonds, with bogus bondsmen on those bonds, to do the work. That is one great failing in these contract matters, and the same way with the Government. Some slick, oily chap comes up and presents Brown and Jones and submits what they have, and they take them.

Mr. MANN. Yet under the gentleman's bill one of these slick gentlemen gets a Government contract and can go ahead and buy supplies and hire labor until he gets the contract almost finished and draws his money from the Government. Then the Government, having paid him, will have to turn around and pay to people who supplied labor and supplies the entire amount in addition.

Mr. RAKER. I think the statute already provides that they must pay within certain limits under the contract. They must pay every week or perhaps every two weeks. But even in a week you can practically ruin the laboring man.

Mr. MANN. We have had the Corbett Tunnel statute, and there has been no statute on the subject enacted since then.

Mr. RAKER. I say, in entering the contract——

Mr. MANN. I say they were not paid in that case.

Mr. RAKER. What amendment would the gentleman suggest as to notice there?

Mr. MANN. I really do not know enough about this form of legislation to suggest the proper amendment, but I hope the gentleman will try to prepare the proper language.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that in the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands, of which the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is not a member——

Mr. MANN. If I were on the gentleman's committee, I would ask that a bill of that sort go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from California yield to me for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. What would occur under this bill in this condition of affairs: A contractor fails; the Government takes over the work and proceeds to the completion of the contract; the cost to the Government for the completion of the contract over the contract price more than exceeds the bond which would be given under this bill; the lien of the Government or the lien of the laborers and those who furnished supplies——

Mr. RAKER. There is no lien here.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, no; you do not call it a lien.

Mr. RAKER. You can not call it a lien.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I will change my question.

Mr. RAKER. Let the gentleman put his question.

Mr. MONDELL. Who would be paid first—the Government or the laborer?

Mr. RAKER. Under this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The laborer.

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt it.

Mr. RAKER. Sure.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not see where the gentleman can read anything of that kind into the bill as it should be.

Mr. RAKER. It is clearly provided in the bill that when the contractor fails to pay, or any other failure occurs, and the work is taken over by the Reclamation Service, or the Government, properly speaking, then the laborers or claimants present their claims to the Secretary of the Interior, and he verifies the claims and pays them out of the reclamation fund.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; out of the reclamation fund, within the liability of the contractor. But the liability of the contractor must necessarily be considered after the cost to the Government, and there is nothing in the gentleman's bill that prefers the labor or prefers the person who furnishes material and supplies over the Government.

Let me remind my friend from California that in the Corbett Tunnel case, which has become rather notorious here, where there was a failing of the contractor, the difficulty was that when the Government came to take over the work and complete it the contractors owed the Government several thousand dollars, $25,000 or $30,000, without taking into consideration the labor or the material; and the result was that there were no funds from which the Government could pay the labor or the material. The Government would have paid the labor——

Mr. RAKER. There is no question but that the Government took out $200,000 or more from the reclamation fund and paid for that work itself. But it left the laborers unprovided for. It left the material men unprovided for. This provision of this bill says that when this condition happens what shall be done? It provides that the Reclamation Service is authorized to pay from the reclamation fund, on account of the contractor and the sureties, for labor and material furnished and ordered by the contractor.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut demands the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objects.

Mr. MANN. I hope this bill can be passed over.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, under the peculiar conditions I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

STANDARD BOX FOR APPLES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11178) to establish a standard box for apples, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the standard box for apples shall be of the following dimensions when measured without distention of its parts:

Depth of end, 10½ inches; width of end, 11½ inches; length of box, 18 inches; all inside measurements, and representing, as nearly as possible, 2,173½ cubic inches.

SEC. 2. That any box in which apples shall be packed and offered for sale which does contain less than the required number of cubical inches, as prescribed in section 1 of this act, shall be plainly marked on one side and one end with the words "Short box," or with words or figures showing the fractional relation which the actual capacity of the box bears to the capacity of the box prescribed in section 1 of this act. The marking required by this paragraph shall be in block letters of the size not less than 72-point block Gothic.

SEC. 3. That standard boxes when packed, shipped, or delivered for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce, or which shall be sold or offered for sale within the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States of America, shall bear upon one or both ends in plain figures the number of apples contained in the box; also in plain letters the style of pack used, the name of the person, firm, company, or organization which first packed or caused the same to be packed; the name of the locality where said apples were grown; and the name of the variety of the apples contained in the box unless the variety is not known to the packer, in which event the box shall be marked "Unknown." A variation of three apples from the number designated as being in the box shall be allowed.

SEC. 4. That the apples contained within the said standard box when so packed and offered for sale, shipment, or delivery in interstate or foreign commerce shall be well-grown specimens, of one variety, reasonably uniform in size, properly matured, practically free from dirt, insect pests, diseases, bruises, and other defects, except such as are necessarily caused in the operation of packing.

SEC. 5. That standard boxes packed in accordance with the provisions of this act may be marked "Standard."

SEC. 6. That boxes containing apples marked "Standard" shall be deemed to be misbranded within the meaning of this act—

When the size of the box does not conform to the requirements of section 1 of this act, and when the markings on the box and the contents thereof do not conform to the requirements of sections 3 and 4 of this act.

SEC. 7. That any person, firm, company, or organization who shall mark or cause to be marked boxes packed with apples to sell, or offer for sale, shipment, or delivery, in interstate or foreign commerce, apples in boxes contrary to the provisions of this act or in violation hereof, or shall sell or offer for sale or delivery in interstate or foreign commerce in a standard box apples other than those originally packed therein without first completely obliterating the original markings and labels on such box and mark the box to conform to the provisions of this act shall be liable to a penalty of $1 for each box so marked, sold, or offered for sale or delivery, and costs, to be recovered at the suit of the United States in any court having jurisdiction: Provided, That the penalty to be recovered on any one shipment shall not exceed the sum of $100, exclusive of costs.

SEC. 8. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1914.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 11, after the word "boxes," insert "marked 'Standard,' as hereinafter provided."

Page 3, after line 17, insert: "Provided, however, That all shipments in boxes to foreign countries in which a standard box may have been established may be marked 'For export, quality of contents equal to American standard.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the minority report on this bill, I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection just a moment?

Mr. DILLON. I will say to the gentlemen that in view of the number of members on the committee who oppose this bill I shall have to object.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman withhold it just a moment? There is a minority report of only two members of the committee.

Mr. DILLON. That is true, but there are other members on the committee who are opposed to this bill.

Mr. RAKER. No; those who were not present filed with the committee their telegrams from their homes in favor of this bill with the two amendments.

Mr. DILLON. I want to say to the gentleman that this bill ought to be fairly considered by the committee. At the time it came up and was considered by the committee there were not a majority of the members present.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? The Senate on Saturday passed a bill, S. 4517, on this subject, with quite a number of amendments.

Mr. WEBB. Making it apply to Colorado alone, did they not?

Mr. MANN. No; except as to one thing.

Mr. RAKER. Colorado just asked to be exempted, that is all.

Mr. MANN. No; the gentleman is not correct about that. There is one provision that applies to Colorado only. The gentleman can not expect to call up the Senate bill, which has never yet been printed with the Senate amendments.

Mr. RAKER. It has been printed.

Mr. MANN. It has not been printed with the Senate amendments. It only came over a few moments ago.

Mr. RAKER. It is printed with the Senate amendments, and is now lying on the Speaker's table, because I saw it there.

Mr. MANN. I know the Senate amendments are printed in the usual way in which they come over from the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. No; the bill with the Senate amendments has been printed.

Mr. MANN. What the gentleman saw was the engrossed copy; but the bill is not printed, as we say, for the information of the House. The gentleman may have seen the engrossed copy of the bill, but it has not been printed for the use of the House yet. I am in favor of the bill, but what is the use of trying to consider it under the circumstances.

Mr. FALCONER. I think the fruit-growing States are greatly in favor of the bill, and I would ask the gentleman from South Dakota why he is opposed to it.

Mr. DILLON. I will say to the gentleman that this committee have taken some testimony on the bill. When it came up for final action a majority of the members were not present. Now, prior to that time the committee reported out a bill known as the Tuttle bill. That made an apple barrel mandatory.

Mr. FALCONER. To the exclusion of the box?

Mr. DILLON. It said nothing at all about the apple box. Now, that bill is upon the calendar. The same committee, counting those who were in favor of the bill but were not present, reported this bill out in optional form. If the apple barrel is mandatory, there is no reason why the apple box should not be mandatory

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The same committee, the same individuals on the committee, and the same absentees concurred in their report on the Tuttle bill as in their report on the Raker bill. The two were heard the same day, and the two reports were written out at the same time, and the same number of men were present in the committee when they reported out the Raker bill, and there were a majority of the members of the committee present, but two of them voted against the bill. Nevertheless, a majority being present, it was voted to report out the bill, and those who were absent sent their telegrams in favor of this bill—H. R. 11178—with the two amendments which were adopted.

Mr. DILLON. Let me say to the gentleman that he is not a member of that committee, and I do not think he knows as much about it as I do. The Tuttle bill has my approval. It was first reported out in optional form, and the growers over the country made complaint, and we gave them a rehearing in the matter, and then we changed our views and reported out the bill in mandatory form, and I joined in that report.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman and I are in accord except on one little matter; that is, whether it shall be mandatory or optional.

Mr. DILLON. But when the gentleman says the two bills were reported out at the same time, he is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. RAKER. That was my recollection.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. RAKER. I may have been mistaken as to the dates.

Mr. DILLON. You are mistaken in reference to that matter.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman being present ought to know about that matter.

Mr. DILLON. I attend all the meetings of committees of which I am a member when I am in the city.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman and I will not differ on this matter except as to the mandatory or discretionary part. I just want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that 95 per cent of the people interested in the apple-box shipments on the Pacific coast, in the intermountain States, and in the East and down in the South, the apple growers are urging this bill, and the only reason why the committee agreed upon the discretionary feature was that we did not want to compel the small raiser, who only ships a few boxes, to come in unless he wanted to. We said to him practically, "Take your dry goods box, or whatever you have in which you can ship your apples. We do not want to compel you to use a uniform box," but we wanted to establish a standard box. If it is used in interstate shipment, if it is used by the general apple grower, the large producer or shipper, he may have his name on the box, and brand it as to the number of apples, the kind of apples, the place where they were raised, that they are free from worms, free from insects, so that the public may know what they are getting, so that the consumer will not be deceived. The idea was that the little fellow who raised a few boxes of apples need not come under the provisions of the law unless he wanted to. He could get a dry goods box and fill it with apples and sell them if he wanted to.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Do you favor uniformity in matters of coinage, weights, and measures?

Mr. RAKER. Uniformity is always a fine thing; yes.

Mr. DILLON. Then why do you want a mandatory apple barrel in the East and an optional apple box in the West?

Mr. RAKER. There is a difference between a barrel and a box.

Mr. DILLON. How are you going to get uniformity in this way?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent that the bill remain on the calendar as it is?

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I think it should be carefully considered by the committee. We have the Senate bill on the calendar, and this bill ought to be given careful consideration, because the question of uniformity is an important one. I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. DILLON. I object.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, on the 5th day of August, 1914, I introduced a resolution to exempt farmers' mutual insurance companies of all kinds from the payment of the penalty provided for in the income provisions of the Underwood tariff bill. In that bill there is a provision requiring all corporations to make a report of their incomes on or before the 1st day of March, 1914. It further provides that a penalty, not to exceed $10,000, shall be imposed in all cases where such report is not made in accordance with the law. Mr. Speaker, it was not the intention of Congress to tax corporations not engaged in business for profit, neither was it our intention to require them to pay a penalty. This question was freely discussed in the lobbies, and no one ever dreamed of such a thing. The real object of this provision was to reach corporations engaged in business for profit. No corporation without an income is subject to an income tax under this law, and it would be manifestly unjust to require such corporations to pay a penalty for a failure to report what? Nothing; for such corporations have no income to report.

All over the country farmers' mutual fire insurance companies have been organized, not for profit but for protection. All the money they handle comes in by way of assessment in the nature of a tax for the purpose of paying losses sustained by members of such companies. They have no business in the sense of actual business. Theirs is all on paper, mostly in the way of a tax to pay real losses by accident, such as by fire or lightning, and it would be very unjust to make these innocent companies pay a fine for failing to make a report as required by law. I understand that no blank reports were sent to them and no request was made upon them for a report.

Mr. Speaker, I took this question up with the Secretary of the Treasury several days ago, and at first he was inclined to the opinion that the law compelled him to assess a penalty. As a lawyer I have some misgivings as to the power to collect the penalty, because the law partakes of the nature of an ex post facto law, yet I am delighted to know that it is not the intention of the Government to exact it. The Secretary of the Treasury generously and graciously decided—and I think justly so—that for this year no penalty would be exacted from corporations not organized for profit. Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from him a few days ago which I ask to be read for the information of the House, and which I will incorporate in the RECORD by permission of the House. The Secretary has kindly given permission to use it as I deem proper.

Mr. Speaker, the following is a copy of my resolution, after which will follow a copy of the Secretary's letter:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 317) to remit certain penalties against certain insurance companies for a failure to make returns on incomes on or before March 1, 1914, as provided by an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913.

Whereas through misrepresentation and misunderstanding of the income-tax law farmers' mutual insurance companies have failed to make the proper return prior to March 1, 1914: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the penalty provided for an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, for a failure to make the proper return on incomes provided for in said act, be, and the same is hereby, remitted in so far as it affects farmers' mutual insurance companies of every kind and character for the present year, where said returns are completed June 1, 1914, and where the failure to make said returns was not due to a willful intent to violate the provisions of said act.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, August 13, 1914.

TO COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE:

The fact has been developed that a great number of individuals and corporations failed to make returns of annual net income for the income tax, either through ignorance of the requirements of the law or through a misunderstanding of its requirements, and it has been determined by the Treasury Department to accept offers in compromise of the specific penalty for failure to file returns within the period prescribed by law in a minimum sum as follows:

Five dollars from individuals; $10 from corporations which are organized for profit.

In the cases of all corporations not organized for profit the specific penalty will not be asserted this year, provided the required return has been or shall be filed before December 31, 1914. The United States district attorney should be requested not to institute proceedings in such cases.

The foregoing applies only to those cases where there was no intent to evade the law or escape taxation.

In all cases, however, wherein a return is not made until the liability to make a return is discovered by investigation of collectors of internal revenue or revenue agents, the above schedule will not necessarily apply, but each individual case will be decided upon its own merits and the amount of the offer in compromise which may be favorably considered will be determined accordingly.

Respectfully,

ROBT. WILLIAMS, Jr.,
Acting Commissioner.

Approved:

W. G. MCADOO,
Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment to the bill (H. R. 18202) to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes.

OIL OR GAS LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15661) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to lease to the occupants thereof certain unpatented lands on which oil or gas has been discovered.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman in charge of this bill, Mr. CHURCH, is not well to-day, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it retain its place upon the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Under the circumstances I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ALCATRAZ ISLAND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9017) transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether there is any other instance in the Immigration Service where the immigration station is located on an island or otherwhere than on the mainland, except at Ellis Island, N. Y.?

Mr. RAKER. There is the one at Ellis Island, N. Y., the most noted one, and, I suppose, the greatest one in the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in reading the report that the Commissioner of Immigration, Mr. Caminetti, who certainly is acquainted with conditions in San Francisco, stated that he would much prefer to have the station located on the mainland. I assume that there are economic and administrative reasons which prompted him to make that suggestion.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. I have talked with him many times. He appeared before the committee at the time the bill was acted upon, and his statements are that economically the matter would be better handled on this island. To obtain a site on the mainland would cost, possibly, $500,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. What other site?

Mr. RAKER. A site on the mainland.

Mr. STAFFORD. I said a moment ago that it was Mr. Caminetti. I assumed that the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, when he wrote this letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, was expressing the views of Mr. Caminetti. In that letter he says:

I desire to say, however, that I would have preferred to have seen the new immigration station for the port of San Francisco located upon the mainland, provided that a convenient site was available.

There is available land there. The Government has two large military stations.

Mr. RAKER. It would be an impossibility to get any of the military territory.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, an impossibility. The Department of War, now recognizing that, after spending $500,000 in erecting a prison on Alcatraz Island, it is no longer suitable for that purpose, wishes now to throw the load of it upon the Immigration Service.

Mr. RAKER. Evidently, my friend does not quite understand the situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may not quite understand it, but I have some understanding of it.

Mr. RAKER. This is at the entrance of the Golden Gate. It is about a mile and a half from the mainland and a mile and a half from the exposition grounds. It is one of the beauty spots of the bay. The buildings on this island are a beauty spot from any point of view. No one would every know there was a prison there. These buildings are the best constructed of any buildings that have been constructed by this Government. Every room is separate, with a separate toilet, with separate water, with air circulation to it by a force plant.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman demands the regular order, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, as this is the Unanimous Consent Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that my friend from Wisconsin withdraw his objection. We would like to have this plant put into operation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was proceeding in a regular way in good faith and the gentleman from Nebraska demanded the regular order. If I can not get the information that I desire, I am going to object. I have no objection to the matter going over without prejudice.

Mr. RAKER. No; I will not ask for that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask to pass it over without prejudice.

Mr. RAKER. No.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made.

Mr. RAKER. That is very true, but I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK, MONT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 654) to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the State of Montana, approved February 17, 1911, ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the territory embraced within the Glacier National Park are hereby accepted, and sole and exclusive jurisdiction is hereby assumed by the United States over such territory, saving, however, to the said State the right to serve civil or criminal process within the limits of the aforesaid park in suits or prosecution for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed in said State, but outside of said park, and saving further to the said State the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises and property, on the lands included in said park. All the laws applicable to places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall have force and effect in said park. All fugitives from justice taking refuge in said park shall be subject to the same laws as refugees from justice found in the State of Montana.

SEC. 2. That said park shall constitute a part of the United States judicial district of Montana, and the district court of the United States in and for said district shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed within said boundaries.

SEC. 3. That if any offense shall be committed in the Glacier National Park, which offense is not prohibited or the punishment is not specifically provided for by any law of the United States, the offender shall be subject to the same punishment as the laws of the State of Montana in force at the time of the commission of the offense may provide for a like offense in said State; and no subsequent repeal of any such law of the State of Montana shall affect any prosecution for said offense committed within said park.

SEC. 4. That all hunting or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any bird or wild animal, except dangerous animals when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting personal injury, is prohibited within the limits of said park; nor shall any fish be taken out of the waters of the park in any other way than by hook and line, and then only at such seasons and in such times and manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park and for the protection of the property therein, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act of May 11, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 354), natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, and for the protection of the animals and birds in the park from capture or destruction, and to prevent their being frightened or driven from the park; and he shall make rules and regulations governing the taking of fish from the streams or lakes in the park. Possession within said park of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any wild bird or animal shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, or stage or express company, or railway company, who knows or has reason to believe that they were taken or killed contrary to the provisions of this act and who receives for transportation any of said animals, birds, or fish so killed, caught, or taken, or who shall violate any of the other provisions of this act or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act of May 11, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 354), natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the park, or who shall within said park commit any damage, injury, or spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act of May 11, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 354), natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon, or situated therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine of not more than $500, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings.

SEC. 5. That all guns, traps, teams, horses, or means of transportation of every nature or description used by any person or persons within said park limits when engaged in killing, trapping, ensnaring, or capturing such wild beasts, birds, or wild animals shall be forfeited to the United States and may be seized by the officers in said park and held pending the prosecution of any person or persons arrested under charge of violating the provisions of this act, and upon conviction under this act of such person or persons using said guns, traps, teams, horses, or other means of transportation, such forfeiture shall be adjudicated as a penalty in addition to the other punishment provided in this act. Such forfeited property shall be disposed of and accounted for by and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the United States district court for the district of Montana shall appoint a commissioner, who shall reside in the park, and who shall have jurisdiction to hear and act upon all complaints made of any violations of law or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior for the government of the park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish, and objects of interest therein, and for other purposes authorized by this act.

Such commissioner shall have power, upon sworn information, to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with the commission of any misdemeanor, or charged with a violation of the rules and regulations, or with a violation of any of the provisions of this act prescribed for the government of said park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish in said park, and to try the person so charged, and, if found guilty, to impose punishment and to adjudge the forfeiture prescribed.

In all cases of conviction an appeal shall lie from the judgment of said commissioner to the United States district court for the district of Montana, and the United States district court in said district shall prescribe the rules of procedure and practice for said commissioner in the trial of cases and for appeal to said United States district court.

SEC. 7. That any such commissioner shall also have power to issue process as hereinbefore provided for the arrest of any person charged with the commission, within said boundaries, of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of section 4 of this act, to hear the evidence introduced, and if he is of opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial, shall cause such person to be safely conveyed to a secure place of confinement within the jurisdiction of the United States district court for the district of Montana, and certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and the testimony in the case to said court, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case: Provided, That the said commissioner shall grant bail in all cases bailable under the laws of the United States or of said State.

SEC. 8. That all process issued by the commissioner shall be directed to the marshal of the United States for the district of Montana, but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the arrest by any officer or employee of the Government, or any person employed by the United States in the policing of said reservation, within said boundaries, without process, of any person taken in the act of violating the law or this act, or the regulations prescribed by said Secretary as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. That the commissioner provided for in this act shall be paid an annual salary of $1,500, payable quarterly: Provided, That the said commissioner shall reside within the exterior boundaries of said Glacier National Park, at a place to be designated by the court making such appointment: And provided further, That all fees, costs, and expenses collected by the commissioner shall be disposed of as provided in sections 11 and 12 of this act.

SEC. 10. That all fees, costs, and expenses arising in cases under this act and properly chargeable to the United States shall be certified, approved, and paid as are like fees, costs, and expenses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 11. That all fines and costs imposed and collected shall be deposited by said commissioner of the United States, or the marshal of the United States collecting the same, with the clerk of the United States district court for the district of Montana.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior shall notify, in writing, the governor of the State of Montana of the passage and approval of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this bill do anything except give to the General Government exclusive jurisdiction over crimes and misdemeanors in the park, a jurisdiction which is now held by the State of Montana?

Mr. STOUT. That is the substance of it, as far as I know, and I have looked it over very carefully. The bill was drawn by the Department of the Interior——

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STOUT. I mean it was not drawn by the Department of the Interior, but——

Mr. MANN. The Interior Department drew a bill a few years ago which floated around this Congress for several Congresses, which proposed to give a commissioner control and the right to send a man to the penitentiary for several years, and they always drew it that way. They drew the bill that way this time, but fortunately the gentleman's State has a Senator who knows something about the law, and Senator WALSH redrew the bill in the Senate and cut out many of the unconstitutional and contradictory provisions from the bill which the War Department drew.

Mr. STOUT. I accept the correction of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STOUT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALCATRAZ ISLAND.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill H. R. 9017. I have seen the gentleman who objected before, and he has no objection to returning to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 230, H. R. 9017. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9017) transferring the control and jurisdiction of Alcatraz Island and its buildings thereon from the Department of War to the Department of Labor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, has consent been given for its consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to return to the bill, and if that does not mean consideration what does it mean?

Mr. STAFFORD. It simply means to take it up again.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire further. When I was interrupted by the demand for the regular order the gentleman was saying that this building was specially suited, or could be adapted, to an immigration station. I desire to ask the gentleman as to whether there is pressing need for this immigration station now at San Francisco?

Mr. RAKER. There is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How far is Alcatraz from Angel Island, the other station?

Mr. RAKER. It is about 15 miles.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it is proposed to maintain two stations?

Mr. RAKER. No, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the proposition?

Mr. RAKER. The Angel Island station has a lot of wooden buildings, etc., that it is intended to be turned over to the War Department for health purposes, and we will only maintain Alcatraz Island as a station.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And you turn over Angel Island to the War Department?

Mr. RAKER. If the Health Service desires it. The Angel Island building is now being used for an immigration station. It could be used, but Alcatraz can accommodate them all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the estimate as to the cost of fixing up Alcatraz Island?

Mr. RAKER. Practically an infinitesimal amount.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Where is the statement of any person who knows anything about it to that effect?

Mr. RAKER. Well, the report is in here from the Secretary of War and the Department of Labor that it is only a very small amount.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman to have it passed over without prejudice. We have an immigration station there, and I do not think we ought to incur an obligation of $50,000 when we are going to use——

Mr. RAKER. We are not asking for $50,000. When Commissioner Caminetti appeared before the committee he said he did not want the money; said he did not need that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what they say when they want legislation, but I know what they say after they get it.

Mr. RAKER. Under the circumstances I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PRESENTING THE STEAM LAUNCH "LOUISE" TO THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5739) to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That as a mark of appreciation of the sacrifices and services of the French people in the construction of the Panama Canal, the steam launch Louise, built in France in 1885, and employed in the construction of the canal successively by the French Panama Canal Co. and by the United States, be put in good condition and presented to the French Government; and that, in the first formal or ceremonial opening or passage of the canal, the place of honor be accorded to the said steam launch, bearing the flag of the French Republic.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $6,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of executing this act, to be disbursed by the governor of the Canal Zone.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out, page 1, lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, the following: " ; and that, in the first formal or ceremonial opening or passage of the canal, the place of honor be accorded to the said steam launch, bearing the flag of the French Republic."

Strike out all of section 2, as follows:

"That the sum of $6,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of executing this act, to be disbursed by the governor of the Canal Zone."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see that the Secretary of War says with reference to that part of the bill which reads "be put in good condition":

In this connection permit me to suggest that the bill or joint resolution, in addition to providing for the transfer, should contain an appropriation of a sufficient fund to cover putting the launch in good condition and delivering her to the French Government.

And, under date of April 16 last, he says:

Referring to previous correspondence in reference to presenting the steam launch Louise to the French Government, and particularly to my letter to you dated April 7 last, I now beg to advise you that a cablegram, dated April 15, has been received from Col. Goethals, governor of the Panama Canal, indicating that it is estimated $6,000 will cover the cost of putting the launch in good condition and delivering her to the French Government, including all expenses connected with the transfer.

Notwithstanding this, the committee proposes to strike out the $6,000 carried by the bill. How is it possible to put it in good condition without the money? Now, how is the launch to be put in good condition without any money?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois will understand that our committee never reports an appropriation if we can avoid it. But inasmuch as at this time all appropriation bills have gone through, I was thinking that the House might vote down that amendment and leave the appropriation in.

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say that I would not consent to the passage of the resolution unless I thought it would carry with it a sufficient appropriation to put the launch in reasonably good condition and pay the expenses of delivering it to the French Government; and we have passed all our general appropriation bills.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it would be wise for the House to disagree to that amendment of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it the intention to have this launch used for anything? She is 30 years old now.

Mr. ADAMSON. It came over with the acquisition from the French company of the canal. It is a matter of sentiment more than anything else.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The canal authorities have authority under the law to put all these matters in good condition, have they not?

Mr. MANN. I do not think they would have authority to do this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not?

Mr. MANN. Because that is not in connection with the construction, maintenance, or operation of the canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the House disagree to that amendment striking the appropriation out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve the right to object. I was trying to listen to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the Speaker at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was endeavoring to do so; yes. What I wish to inquire of the gentleman is whether it is the purpose to put this launch into shape to be used? Is it not to be kept more for the historical interest that would be shown in it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose it is the intention to repair it as far as possible in order to put it in presentable shape to be given to the French Government, and not that it is to be used to construct other canals with; but more as a matter of sentiment, as a compliment, to the French people, from whom we acquired it with other property there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman from Georgia aware of any particular reason why this launch was selected as the peculiar trophy to be presented to France?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it was selected by the people in charge down there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. This originated with the distinguished Senator from my own State.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, it seems to have received the approval of Col. Goethals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He was consulted afterwards.

Mr. ADAMSON. All of these things have to have an origin somewhere.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What I desire to know is the peculiar historical significance of the launch Louise.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only significance I see about it is that perhaps it is the principal launch the French Government turned over to us that they used during their work on the canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The French Government did not turn it over to us at all. It was the property of the old French company. Now, if the gentleman has suggested that the House might disagree to the amendment appropriating the money, I assume if we are going to present this launch to France we ought to put it in decent condition. But how about the other amendment? That is, the gentleman's committee recommends the striking out of the provision that this boat shall be first in the ceremonial opening of the canal.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not think, even with the high degree of courtesy we feel toward France ourselves, that we should abdicate our right to fix the order of proceeding through the canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman insist on the amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not our friend from Georgia think that France is having a good deal of trouble just now without giving her this?

Mr. ADAMSON. I was wondering, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, if we are going to complicate our attitude as to neutrality during the present condition abroad. I do not wish to give offense to any other nation that is in the war with France. I want to disavow any intention of that sort.

Mr. MANN. I was not referring to that. But what on earth will France do with the vessel? If France gave us a vessel of this sort, what would we do with it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Possibly we would buy a navy yard to put it in.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand the French Government, as a matter of historical sentiment, expressed not only a willingness to accept it but a desire for it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The French Government was asked whether it would accept a gift of this vessel, and with great politeness which distinguishes that race they said they would be delighted to have the opportunity to accept it. They are a little bit different from us. At the time of the World's Fair at Chicago we had presented to us duplicates of the caravels in which Columbus first discovered America. I do not know just where they are now, but I know that they have been a white elephant on the hands of different societies, municipalities, and so forth, since that time, each one generally trying to unload the preservation and care of these vessels upon some one else. There was a recent controversy about it, but just what became of it I do not know. I do not know what we would do if the French Government gave us a boat that could not be used.

Mr. ADAMSON. We were diplomatic enough to use those vessels in a way so that they did not result in bringing on the Spanish War. I think France could handle it in some way so as not to give offense to us about it.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Do I understand from the gentleman from Georgia that we are preparing a launch to go through the Panama Canal at the formal opening for a foreign Government, and that the launch is to have the place of honor?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman so understands, he misunderstands me, Mr. Speaker. We have stricken that provision from the Senate bill. We reserve the right to make our own choice as to the order of procession through that canal.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Does not the bill state that this ship——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will keep it in confidence, I will tell him that some of our own crowd will go through on the first ship. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I hope so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, strike out all of section 1 after the word "Government," in line 9, and all of section 2, on page 2.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, those are two distinct amendments.

The SPEAKER. Which is the first one?

Mr. MANN. It is specific, section by section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after the word "Government" in line 9 of page 1.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by striking out section 2.

Mr. ADAMSON. That contains the appropriation.

The SPEAKER. That is the one the gentleman wants beaten?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; I want to defeat that if I can.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

ENLARGED SITE, PUBLIC BUILDING, PLYMOUTH, MASS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16829) to provide for enlarging the site for the United States building at Plymouth, Mass.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise all the land in the old William Brewster plat still owned by private parties and contiguous to the public-building site now owned by the United States at Plymouth, Mass., and that the total cost of such extension and improvement shall not exceed the sum of $12,000: Provided, That if the land described shall be obtained for less than the amount authorized, the remainder may be used by the Secretary of the Treasury in grading and otherwise improving the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what improvement is contemplated on this enlarged site?

Mr. THACHER. I shall be very glad to give information about this matter. This is in the town of Plymouth, Mass. In the original bill, introduced some years ago, the construction of the post office now going up on the corner of Main and Leyden Streets was authorized. At the time the bill was brought in they ought to have taken in a little more land.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. THACHER. The town of Plymouth contains from 13,000 to 14,000 inhabitants. It is growing very rapidly. Plymouth Rock, where the Pilgrims landed from the Mayflower in 1620, is about a quarter of a mile away from the site of this post office, which is located at the corner of Leyden Street, which runs from the harbor in a westerly direction, and Main Street, which runs north and south. This is the original plat given to Elder Brewster in 1620, and here he taught religious and civic liberty. Here the post-office building is being erected. At this corner there formerly stood a church, and it was expected that the people who owned this church would move the church to the land now proposed to be acquired. After the Government had acquired the property which they now own the church society decided to move the church to another part of the town. One piece of property now owned by the Government contained a dwelling house, and public-spirited citizens of Plymouth joined together and bought the building at their own expense and moved it away in order that it might not be located on the land now desired to be acquired. The land contains about 7,700 feet in area. As the letter from the Treasury Department, which looks with favor on the proposed legislation, states, it has been necessary to encroach upon the 40-foot fire limit, there being but 24 feet between the post-office building and the boundary.

This property has changed hands recently, and it is very possible that there may be some unsuitable building built close to the post office which would greatly increase the fire risk.

The town of Plymouth has spent about $47,000 in widening Main Street and building a causeway over the town brook, which is the southern boundary of the land. The town proposes to spend about $30,000 in widening Main Street north from the post office. Plymouth has been liberal and generous in her expenditures and has shown that she is proud of the building, and I believe is ready to do more. To be perfectly frank, I think the property ought to have been acquired a year or two ago, when the bill was originally brought in.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THACHER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How wide is this strip of land?

Mr. THACHER. I can give you the exact area.

Mr. MANN. The report says the area is 40,000 feet, but that does not mean anything to me.

Mr. THACHER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It does state in the report that the total area of land acquired and to be acquired will be 40,000 square feet, but that is incorrect. I have the exact figures here. Possibly I am to blame for that incorrectness.

Mr. MANN. Oh, nobody is to blame for errors.

Mr. THACHER. I think I made a mistake last winter. When they asked me, I did not have the figures. I corrected the mistake afterwards. The land proposed to be acquired is 7,700 square feet.

Mr. MANN. How wide is it at this point?

Mr. THACHER. It is 57 feet at this northern line here [indicating].

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the law contemplates 40 feet space for fire protection. The Treasury Department has either violated the law, or else perhaps the law did not apply to this case; but it has encroached upon this fire limit, so that there are now only 24 feet between the building and the outer line——

Mr. THACHER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, you propose to add to that how many feet?

Mr. THACHER. The width of the lot is 57 feet.

Mr. MANN. That would leave a fire space of 81 feet.

Mr. THACHER. I do not think that that is correct.

Mr. MANN. It is if those figures are right.

Mr. THACHER. Fifty-seven is the width of the lot but not the length. Here is about the way it is: As you will see by the map, the Government owns this property in here [indicating], and it is proposed to acquire this property here which runs along Main Street to the town brook. The width of this is 57 feet, and the building comes right close up to this line here.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will give us all better information if he will throw his map away and describe it to us as it appears to him in his mind's eye. The reason stated in the report is that the acquisition of this land will do away with the probable erection of unsightly buildings in close proximity to the Federal building. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think we ought to buy all the land around the Federal building for fear somebody will put up an unsightly building?

Mr. THACHER. I will answer that question. It is a little difficult to make the whole thing plain in a few moments. There is a probability that there will be a moving-picture show, or some cheap building, erected there and greatly increase the fire risk. Along here on the opposite side of the town brook there is a moving-picture show going up. The man who has bought the land has threatened to put up something there. Of course you can disregard that, but if there is to be a moving-picture show there in a cheap wooden building you have the risk of fire.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the objection to a moving-picture show? Is it not the most highly educational institution there is in the country to-day?

Mr. THACHER. It will not be a fireproof building.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter to be regulated by the city of Plymouth, whether it is to be fireproof or not. Does the gentleman think, because the city of Plymouth will not make proper regulations about the construction of fireproof buildings, we ought to buy all the property there where they could put up buildings which might burn? Of course the gentleman does not think that. I do not seriously ask him that question.

Mr. THACHER. I do not think it is altogether the moving-picture situation, but I would like to make the matter clear.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut demands the regular order. The regular order is, is there objection?

Mr. MANN. If I can not get the information I want, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. THACHER. I ask the gentleman if he will not be good enough to allow me time to explain this?

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to give the gentleman plenty of time. He will have to charge it up to the gentleman from Connecticut. He is the one who is interfering with the bill.

Mr. THACHER. I hope the gentleman will withhold that. I ask permission to explain this——

The SPEAKER. But the trouble is, the gentleman from Connecticut seems to stick to his demand.

Mr. THACHER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his bill be passed without prejudice. Is these objection?

There was no objection.

TERMS OF COURT AT ELKINS AND WILLIAMSON, W. VA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5574) to amend and reenact section 113, of chapter 5, of the Judicial Code of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States be amended and reenacted so that the same shall read as follows:

"SEC. 113. The State of West Virginia is divided into two districts, to be known as the northern and southern districts of West Virginia. The northern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Hancock, Brooke, Ohio, Marshall, Tyler, Pleasants, Wood, Wirt, Ritchie, Doddridge, Wetzel, Monongalia, Marion, Harrison, Lewis, Gilmer, Calhoun, Upshur, Barbour, Taylor, Preston, Tucker, Randolph, Pendleton, Hardy, Grant, Mineral, Hampshire, Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for the northern district shall be held at Martinsburg on the first Tuesday of April and the third Tuesday of September; at Clarksburg on the second Tuesday of April and the first Tuesday of October; at Wheeling on the first Tuesday of May and the third Tuesday of October; at Philippi on the fourth Tuesday of May and the second Tuesday of November; at Elkins on the first Tuesday in July and the first Tuesday in December; and at Parkersburg on the second Tuesday of January and the second Tuesday of June: Provided, That a place for holding court at Philippi shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Barbour County until other provision is made therefor by law: And provided further, That a place for holding court at Elkins shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Randolph County until other provision is made therefor by law. The southern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Jackson, Roane, Clay, Braxton, Webster, Nicholas, Pocahontas, Greenbrier, Fayette, Boone, Kanawha, Putnam, Mason, Cabell, Wayne, Lincoln, Logan, Mingo, Raleigh, Wyoming, McDowell, Mercer, Summers, and Monroe, with the waters thereof. Terms of the district court for the southern district shall be held at Charleston on the first Tuesday of June and the third Tuesday of November; at Huntington on the first Tuesday of April and the first Tuesday after the third Monday of September; at Bluefield on the first Tuesday of May and the third Tuesday of October; at Williamson on the first Tuesday of October; at Webster Springs on the first Tuesday of September; and at Lewisburg on the second Tuesday of July: Provided, That a place for holding court at Webster Springs shall be furnished free of cost to the United States: And provided further, That no court shall be held at Williamson until a suitable building for the holding of said court shall have been provided.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "further," strike out the words "That no court shall be held at Williamson until a suitable building for the holding of said court shall have been provided" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That a place for holding court at Williamson shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Mingo County until other provision is made therefor by law."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS TO DENVER, COLO., FOR PARK PURPOSES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15533) granting public lands to the city and county of Denver, in the State of Colorado, for public park purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TALYOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, there is a duplicate of this bill, passed by the Senate, which is on this same calendar, Calendar No. 270, S. 5197, with a report, No. 989. I would like to have that considered instead of the House bill. I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to consider Senate bill 5197, Calendar No. 270, in lieu of House bill 15533, Calendar No. 235, being identical in text. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and convey to the city and county of Denver, a municipal corporation in the State of Colorado, for public park purposes, and for the use and benefit of said city and county, the following-described land, or so much thereof as said city and county may desire, to wit:

Total, 7,047 acres, more or less.

SEC. 2. That the conveyance shall be made of the said lands to said city and county of Denver by the Secretary of the Interior upon payment by the said city and county for the said land, or such portions thereof as it may select, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, and patent issued to said city and county for the said land selected, to have and to hold for public park purposes, and that there shall be excepted from the grant hereby made any lands which at the date of the approval of this act shall be covered by a valid, existing, bona fide right or claim initiated under the laws of the United States: Provided, That this exception shall not continue to apply to any particular tract of land unless the claimant continues to comply with the law under which the claim or right was initiated: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the land so granted and all necessary use of the land for extracting same: Provided further, That said city and county shall not have the right to sell or convey the land herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as before described, and that if the said lands shall be used for any purpose other than public park purposes the same, or such parts thereof so used, shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask one question. I see that the House bill was amended by the committee so as to make the city pay the Government price for this land, upon a part of which the Government price is $2.50 an acre. I suppose the same recommendation was made to the Senate committee; but that is not the way the Senate bill is.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Identically the same recommendation was sent to the Senate committee that was sent to the House committee, but the Senate felt, inasmuch as the land was of no value, or if there was any value it was reserved to the Government, that $1.25 an acre was as much as we have been making any other city pay anywhere for any Government land, so they made it at the flat rate of $1.25 an acre. At that rate it makes the city pay $10,000.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that was the gentleman's own proposition in the committee? The House committee reported the bill in that way.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; the House committee reported it in that way; that is true.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is not always possible to tell just what the land is worth. I notice in the report of the Secretary of the Interior upon this bill that he says the purpose of it is largely to protect the timber thereon, and then the committee says that there is no timber on it worth protecting. There is a difference of opinion. I do not know which is correct.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Forest Service in the Interior Department sent a man out there who went all over this, a Mr. Marshall. He made an elaborate report upon it, and while there is considerable scrub cedar there, and it does to a certain extent help to beautify the territory, at the same time it is not what you would call merchantable timber at all, and if it was not protected the people would go up there and cut it into firewood or into fence posts, and destroy it.

Mr. MANN. They have not yet.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. They have been trying to keep them off there. The gentleman knows that this is all withdrawn from all forms of entry by President Taft.

Mr. MANN. At the gentleman's request?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. I have been trying to assist the city of Denver in getting these foothills there which you can see from the city of Denver for quite a number of miles off as a city outing place, with drives and parks. I have been assisting them for a number of years in that. The Interior Department and the Forest Service and the public generally have been favorable to the measure. In view of Denver being our capital and a resort place, and in view of the fact that hundreds of thousands of people go there in the course of a year, they would like to have some place to drive up into the mountains, and this is to encourage them in preserving what timber and scenery there are there as a park for the public.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the land in question. It lies to the west of the city of Denver, in the foothills, and the purpose of the park is to provide several miles, some fifty-odd or more, of automobile roads that would carry the spectator in a series of winding ascents gradually up the mountain, in order to afford a magnificent view of the plain. The land is absolutely of no account for cultivation, and I doubt very much if there is any considerable amount of timber upon it, but it will give to the city of Denver a magnificent mountain park and a large and splendid view of all of that region and the country around about.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say that there is no merchantable timber, because this being right there within the city of Denver, and it has been a city for 40 years, if there was merchantable timber up there of any value it would have been cut off long ago. It has been cut off and burned over. I am referring to merchantable timber, of course. There is small timber there.

Mr. MANN. I suppose there is a good deal of white birch growing up there.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it grows all over that country.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We felt that in paying $1.25 an acre for it we would we paying enough, but I said to the House committee that if the House insisted upon our paying $2.50 an acre, of course there is some of it there that we would have to pay that for, but I think the Senate has passed the bill in proper form.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend section 2 of the bill, page 5, line 17, by striking out the words "grants hereby made" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "sales hereby authorized."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 17, strike out the word "grant" and insert the word "sale"; and strike out the word "made" and insert the word "authorized."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The similar House bill, H. R. 15533, was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SILETZ INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 15803, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians on the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians of the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That the proceeds derived from the sale of any lands hereunder, after reimbursing the United States for the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be paid, share and share alike, to the enrolled members of the tribe."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see that the committee did not agree with the department, and I think we ought at least to have a statement of the situation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, when this reservation was opened, the Government reserved five sections of land and certain lands around the present town site from the grant of lands by the Indians to the Government. These were reserved for the benefit of the Indians. The act of 1910, passed later, provided that the lands should be sold and that the money should be used for school purposes. These Indians have their lands in severalty, and they are taxpayers on the rolls of Lincoln County, in which this reservation is located. They aid in the support of the county schools and attend the county schools, and the county officials and the patrons of the schools are anxious for them to do so. There are 14 county schools within the bounds of the reservation. Therefore it is unjust to the Indians, on the one hand, to use this money derived from the sale of five sections for school purposes, when they already contribute a very large amount to the maintenance of the county schools and are acceptable students in the county schools and are taxpayers. Second, there is no necessity for it.

The department in its recommendation desired, as it generally does, to retain the money of the Indians in its own hands, but these Indians have their lands in severalty. I have seen a number of their houses and farms, and they are endeavoring to become useful citizens of the United States and to support and maintain themselves. They are well liked by the people of the county and they take part in the county fair, which is supported in part by the State. And it is the general opinion there that it will be good for the Indians that they no longer be held in tutelage by the Government and their moneys withheld from them, but that their moneys be paid directly to them. The money received from the Government when the reservation was opened was paid over to the Indians. A number of these Indians have used their money upon their lands and in buying stock; some of the older Indians still have part of their shares in money, and there is no reason I nor anyone knowing aything of the facts can see why the Indians should not be given this money and let it be used for their benefit and improvement. They are self-supporting people now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many Indians are there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Four hundred and thirty-four in all, as I remember.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the value of these lands, or the amount likely to accrue from the sales of these lands?

Mr. HAWLEY. I can only estimate it. There are 3,200 acres, and they should be worth, I should think, as timberland, in part at least, probably $150,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it timberland?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any water power?

Mr. HAWLEY. If there is any water power, this does not change the act referred to. Section 2 reserves all water power.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill proposes, as I understand, to sell all the lands that have not heretofore been sold.

Mr. HAWLEY. The act of May 13, 1910, reserves all water power. This proposes, instead of appropriating the money or using the money to maintain schools, that the Indians be given their own money.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the report of the Secretary there is the statement from the Government superintendent that they are not in a very flourishing condition, and upon that report the Secretary recommends that this fund should not be mandatorily paid to members of the tribe, but be placed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior so they may expend it for the benefit of the Indians. It is stated here—and the gentleman is well aware—that they have not very much stock on their property, and that it would be to their interest to have the Government purchase breeding stock and purchase other stock so as to care for and advance the welfare of the Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. In the opinion of the committee these Indians, as stated by the gentleman from Oregon, are self-supporting, voters and taxpayers in the State of Oregon, and apparently abundantly able to take care of and manage their own affairs; but we believe that it would be much better for them to take the proceeds from the sale of these lands—it is the last matter, I understand, between them and the Government—and get away from the supervision of the Government. Now, the gentleman knows that it is the policy of every bureau of this Government to retain and withhold power and supervision, and especially if there is any money, this superintendent, who the gentleman says has reported against this matter, would deposit this money in banks and pay it out to the Indians, and the Indians would have to come to him, hat in hand, when they wanted anything, and that increases his importance, and so forth, and it seems to me that the action of the committee is thoroughly justified and would be better than to follow the suggestion of the superintendent.

Mr. STAFFORD. To my mind the question is not whether it increases the importance of the superintendent, but what is best for the Indians.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is going to——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill. There is nothing else to do that I know of.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Oregon was up asking unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. But there may be debate wanted on the bill. If we are to be shut off from our right to debate, there are other ways in which we can get it. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon arose prior to the gentleman from Illinois and asked unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15803.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15803, with Mr. MOSS of Indiana in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 15803, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15803) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians on the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, it having been read in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] objects, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15803) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians on the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians of the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That the proceeds derived from the sale of any lands hereunder, after reimbursing the United States for the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be paid, share and share alike, to the enrolled members of the tribe."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. For how long am I recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MANN. I shall not take the time, although I could use the hour in discussing the bill, and take a great deal longer in that way for the consideration of the bill than by the reasonable method of reserving the right to object which Members have, and endeavoring to learn in regard to the bill under the reservation. The consideration of these bills by unanimous consent must necessarily be by unanimous consent, and anybody can throw a monkey wrench into the machinery. It does not require intelligence. It does not require discrimination——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Considering what I was just saying, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. That satisfies me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-six gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOSS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (H. R. 15803) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians on the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 227 Members had responded to their names, and he presented therewith a list of absentees for publication in the RECORD and in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having under consideration House bill 15803, found itself without a quorum, and under the rule he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 227 Members—a quorum—had responded to their names, and he presents a list of absentees for publication in the RECORD and the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much of my time had I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois used five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that I did not use more than a minute. However, I will not quarrel over the odd four minutes. I had not expected to have such a large audience upon this very important bill, relating to the Siletz Indian Reservation, but owing to the enthusiasm and courtesy of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], he insisted upon the Members coming here to listen. [Laughter.]

I do not intend to consume the time allotted to me, Mr. Chairman, although here is a bill that ought to have consideration, and that was receiving reasonable and proper consideration in the House under the right reserved to object, and before anybody had any opportunity to learn anything about the bill the regular order was demanded. I observed that anyone can throw a monkey wrench into the machinery in regard to unanimous consent, but it does not follow therefore that every monkey ought to throw a wrench. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when I was proceeding in order during the consideration of this bill under the reservation of an objection, the question was asked of a member of the committee as to whether this bill would surrender the water-power privileges on this reservation and cause them to be sold. The gentleman of whom I made the inquiry informed me—and I know he informed me in the best of faith—that that provision was not included in this bill and was provided for in the foregoing provision. On referring to the original act—and I wish to direct his attention to it—I find that provision is made for the reservation of these water powers in the section to be amended. The bill under consideration repeals section 3 of the act that was passed on May 13, 1910, which act permitted the sale of certain lands on the Siletz Indian Reservation. In section 3—and I wish to direct to the especial attention of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] the phraseology as found in the original act—

That when such lands shall be surveyed and platted they shall be appraised and sold, except such lands as are reserved for water-power sites, as provided in section 2 of this act.

Under the proposed bill we are proposing to repeal that section and substitute new language entirely, without any reservation whatever as to water-power sites; and under my construction—and I believe it is a reasonable construction, and I crave the attention of others members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I see before me my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] who is always watchful of the interests of the Indians—we will be subjecting these water-power sites to sale.

This is not a little proposition. This is a matter involving hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Secretary of the Interior recommends that this fund be reserved for the benefit of the Indians; but here we have the Indian Committee departing from the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and saying that the fund should be turned over absolutely to the Indians. The report, containing the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, shows that these Indians are in rather destitute circumstances.

I do not charge any bad faith to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], who tried to foreclose reasonable consideration of this bill, and I do not say that he wittingly had any disposition to have this bill rushed through the House and thereby jeopardize the interests of the Indians.

Mr. Chairman, when bills are reported here in the House affecting the interests of the Indians it is too frequently the case that their interests are not properly safeguarded. Only three years ago Congress passed the bill which it is proposed to amend, and it was then the deliberate judgment of this House that the funds from certain lands should be reserved for the benefit of the Indians. Here we have the report of the Secretary of the Interior recommending that though these lands be sold the funds be reserved for their benefit. The report says these Indians are in destitute circumstances; that they have only 3 bulls, 138 cows, and a very few chickens and sheep. The Secretary of the Interior recommends that these funds be utilized for the benefit of the Indians themselves. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] says that it is not advisable to reserve these funds any longer, but that we should go contrary to the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior and parcel out this money piecemeal to the respective Indians.

But there is more than that. These are valuable forest lands, with valuable water powers contained on them. The Indians are entitled to those water powers. That valuable franchise should not be sacrificed by selling them to some private interests. When it is sacrificed and the money deposited in the hands of the Indians, we who have some knowledge of the history of moneys furnished to the Indians know that their money goes rapidly, and the Indians are left a charge upon the people of the community.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will gladly yield.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will read the statute on page 367, section 3, I will state to him that it was the intention of the committee to have section 3 read exactly as it reads in the statute down to the word "domain," and then after that comes the language that is in this bill as section 3. I do not know how the mistake occurred, but the report fails to show what the committee intended should be done. It was not intended to leave out the first four lines of section 3 as they appear in the statute.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me to ask him a further question: If it is the intention to reserve the water powers on these lands for the benefit of these Indians, why should not the lands themselves be reserved for their benefit? What reason for the haste? What is the need of it? These lands were sold only three years ago, and the Indians received the returns. Why should we proceed now to sell the remaining lands and divide up the money?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The act of 1892 provided for the sale of all of the lands belonging to the Indians except about five sections, which were reserved. The 1910 act authorized the sale of the lands reserved and they might have been already sold. This bill simply provides that the proceeds directed by the 1910 act to be used for educational purposes shall be paid to the Indians. The bill does not change the law a particle in any other particular, and I call the attention of the gentleman to section 2, which is in no way changed, which expressly provides that the water-power sites shall be reserved.

The committee did not intend, and it is not the purpose of this bill, to change the act of May 13, 1910, at all, except to provide that certain moneys received from the sale of the lands shall be paid to the Indians instead of expended for educational purposes, when there are public schools provided by taxation and the Indians are contributing as taxpayers toward the maintenance and support of the schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if this bill is passed and these lands are sold, and there are no qualification as to the use of these funds, the Indians will have no other lands remaining except their own allotments that they received under the original law.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They are self-supporting, and they are full citizens of the State of Oregon. They are taxpayers and voters, and it is not the function of the Government to supervise the affairs of its citizens. If the Indians should not use the money properly and should become paupers, it would be up to the State of Oregon to take care of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the State of Michigan and other States they have become public charges; but these Indians are still our wards. They still have property.

It is their property which we wish to safeguard, and you are proposing by this bill to go contrary to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, which is to hold the funds for their benefit. You are proposing to have the money parceled out when we know it will not remain very long in their possession. Personally I would much rather follow the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and have these proceeds reserved for the benefit of the Indians. What objection can there be? We know they need attention. Why should we throw them upon the mercies of the public when in only a few years they will again become public charges and perhaps paupers?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to ask the gentleman if in his opinion it is not a wiser policy to give the Indian his property just as far as he is able intelligently to handle it rather than to keep it in our possession and dole it out to him bit by bit?

Mr. STAFFORD. When it is shown, as it is shown in this case, that these Indians are not capable of protecting themselves, not able to make their own livelihood, then I say such property as remains in the hands of the Government should be retained and paid out piecemeal for their benefit.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman has correctly stated the situation, I am sure that the conclusion he reaches is correct; but I do not think that he will find in the report the premise that these Indians are not capable of taking care of their own property for themselves.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that is the fair inference from the report of the Assistant Secretary.

Mr. MILLER. The report is rather silent upon that. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] had personal information about these Indians, which he communicated to the committee, and that, in addition to other information, convinced us that these Indians were rather advanced, speaking of Indians generally, in their capacity to handle their own affairs, and that it would be extremely unwise to keep such a little bit as this is and not pay it out to them.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this would mean several hundred dollars per Indian.

Mr. MILLER. We thought it would be better to give it to them rather than keep the proceeds, so that they could purchase additional stock.

Mr. STAFFORD. The department wishes to purchase it for them, so that they can not waste these funds.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Indian is not capable of managing his affairs in the purchase of his stock, then if the department should purchase a fine bull or a horse, he would sell it the minute he got it, would he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the whole policy of the Interior Department is at fault. We have been passing any number of bills here granting power to the department to purchase supplies for Indians upon the idea that it will be conserved after it has been transferred to the Indians themselves, but here we have a report which positively states that they have not any great quantity of stock, very little poultry, and it was a reasonable inference, reading that letter of the Assistant Secretary that they are in rather destitute circumstances and need protection.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the matter of the first part of section 3, it was not the intention of anyone to eliminate the first four lines, as given in the Revised Statutes, and I am going to move, when the bill comes up for consideration under the five-minute rule, that the first four lines of that section be restored, that only the part of the section be changed which pays the money to the Indians directly instead of leaving it in the hands of the department to parcel it out to them as its agent may see fit. The lands of the former Siletz Indian Reservation were bought by the United States from the Indians about 20 years ago, in round numbers, and the lands then reserved from that transfer are the lands now under consideration. I see the act is dated 1892. The money was distributed to the Indians very shortly after the ratification of the treaty, which was within a few years later. The Indians used that money after they received their allotments for the building of barns and houses and fences and the purchase of stock. They have maintained themselves now for nearly 20 years in very comfortable circumstances. I have been on the reservation and have seen some of the houses and the farms. They are learning to farm. They are proud of the fact that they are making their way alongside of the white man, who bought the lands that were sold or disposed of in the reservation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Is it not a fact that these particular Indians are not as a class stock raisers, but are more agriculturists?

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is right about that, and I was coming to that. I do not know at what time of the year the gentleman who made this report to the department made it. They sell at certain periods of the year, when the market is right, the surplus stock on the land. It may have been that that was done immediately before this man made this report. As a usual thing they "run" a few stock, but they are mostly agricultural, as I understand. The lands are very valuable for agricultural purposes, although they do raise some stock, and in contradistinction to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has said, I know that for nearly 20 years these Indians have made a good and sufficient living on the lands allotted to them, and, in fact, many of them have a part of the original amount paid to them by the Government for the land. Now, there is no reason why the money should not be paid to them. It was reserved in the original bill because it was thought it was necessary for school purposes. The Indians are taxpayers and voters. These children attend the public schools, which they help to maintain with their taxes. Everybody is satisfied with the arrangement, and the department itself requests that the money be no longer held for school purposes, but that it shall be devoted to the buying of stock for the Indians. Now, if the department is to hold this money and buy stock for the Indians, it must keep an account with each separate Indian, because each Indian under the original act is entitled to share and share alike.

If he is entitled to $300 or $400 the department must keep an account with each Indian. It must buy for each Indian so much stock, and when it runs up to that amount it must quit. Those who are capable of handling their stock and using it wisely will apply for the money to be used in buying of the stock, and they would use the money themselves if they had it for the buying of stock, and if there is any Indian so careless that he would not apply for the purchase of stock he would not get the money, and if the Government reserves the money for the purchase of stock and then an Indian is entitled to $300 and comes and says that he wants to buy some cows or some sheep or hogs, immediately after the Government has purchased them and put them on the land they belong to him and he can sell them. Why not give the money to them directly and save the expense of the Government in buying, and handling all this money, and save to the Indians the cost which would be taken out by the Government for the administration and handling of this money?

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. MILLER. Has the gentleman given consideration as to whether or not a large part of this might be used in the expense of administration by the department handling the money in the purchase in the way in which he indicates?

Mr. HAWLEY. Unless the money was appropriated otherwise—and there is no other money appropriated, I think—the expenditures would probably be paid out of this sum and a considerable portion of their fund used for administration. The moneys received formerly by these Indians from the sale of the Siletz Reservation have been as wisely used as any body of men and women would have used them, and the moneys to be received from the sale of these reserved lands likewise will be well used, and better, I think, as the Indians have had more experience. I never heard that the moneys formerly received were taken by white or other adventurers from the Indians at the Siletz Reservation. It is a community of agricultural people. It might have been said that the former moneys should have been left in the hands of the department to be expended by the department for the Indians. But the wiser course was at that time pursued, and in the light of the experience we have had of these Indians there is no reason why that course should at this time be changed. The moneys derived from the sale of these reserved lands should be given to the Indians enrolled as members of the tribe, share and share alike. It was formerly so done, and it proved the best thing that could have been done. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I was detained by a subcommittee meeting when this bill first came up, and therefore have not heard all of the discussion. I see, however, that my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was on the job, and, as usual, was looking out for the protection of the Indian. In a general way, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in a treatment of the Indian question many of us fall into the error of viewing the Indian as a narrow or distinct type. There are as many different kinds of Indians as there are different kinds of white men. There are stock-raising Indians and nonstock-raising Indians. There are agricultural Indians and nonagricultural Indians. There are smart Indians and dull Indians. There are industrious Indians and lazy Indians. The difficulty with our system is that we have tried to narrow it down to a certain type and bring all Indians within its restricted scope. We are dealing here with a number of Indians who, from representations made before our committee, were shown to be self-supporting, self-sustaining Indians, ready to take upon themselves the full responsibilities of United States citizenship, ready to accept everything that may come to them, ready to merge into a general citizenship and make their own way. There is nothing so calculated to discourage initiative character in a man as too much paternalism. I believe that the noncompetent Indian should be protected, but I believe that a distinction should be made between the incompetent and the competent Indian, and that as soon as an Indian becomes competent, as soon as he reaches the point of intelligence at which he can care for himself, any further attempt to supervise his actions or supply his wants simply stimulates indolence and destroys such initiative character as we have been able to build up.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. CARTER. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I notice that the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior recommends that these words be inserted:

> In the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior may be paid to or expended for the benefit of the Indians entitled thereto, in such manner and for such purposes as he may prescribe.

Now, he would leave it to the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain whether some of these Indians were competent to take care of the money and expend it discreetly, and he would leave it to the Secretary of the Interior, if they were not so competent, to expend it for them.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER. But if you hand it all over to them, they are going to lose it.

Mr. CARTER. I have not any objection, Mr. Chairman, to that language going into this bill if this House thinks it is necessary after what has been said. But I repeat here that we have a class of Indians who, it was represented to our committee by everyone, including the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], and I think by the department, were competent to accept the responsibilities of citizenship. It may be possible that there one or even a dozen are not competent, but where can you show me a community of white people in this country in which everyone is competent to take care of everything that comes into his hands. I would dislike to have that rule applied to myself at times.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Oklahoma may overlook the fact that these lands were authorized to be sold originally in 1892. The money was paid to the Indians—the proceeds received from those sales. The allotments, instead of being allotments as ordinarily, were restricted. They have fee title to their land.

Mr. CARTER. I was going to get to that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They are citizens in every sense. They are in no way restricted Indians.

Mr. CARTER. They have fee patents now to their lands and titles to those lands, and are paying taxes upon them. If the Indian is competent to take care of his land and make his living upon it, having a full fee title to it, and does not dispose of it, or takes care of the funds for which he might dispose of that land, it occurs to me there is very little in the contention that he might not be able to take care of the funds that might be handed to him by the Federal Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to get back to the point I was just discussing, which is this: There is nothing on the face of the earth that will make a man dependent any more than for him to think that away out in the future he may have some money coming to him whenever he may call on the Secretary of the Interior. My notion is that this money should be paid over to these people, because they are competent to handle it, and they should not be expecting that the Federal Government is going to do something for them in the future. If they are citizens, let us make them citizens in fact. Let us make them citizens to all intents and purposes. Let us put all the responsibilities upon them and give them all the privileges.

Mr. MILLER. Will my colleague on the committee yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Would it be the Secretary of the Interior himself or an agent of the Indian Office somewhere out in Oregon who would determine whether or not to pay the money to the Indians, or whether or not to divide things for them or what should be bought?

Mr. CARTER. It would necessarily be an agent, or more likely a clerk in the agency office. Neither the Secretary, the Indian Commissioner, nor any one in the Indian Office here would be likely to see this Indian. If these Indians are similar to some of the Indians with whom I have come in contact, some of them may have earning capacities of $2,000 or $3,000 per year. Under the proposed suggestion this man would probably have some clerk passing on his competency whose salary does not exceed $1,200 or $1,500 per annum.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask one more question?

Mr. CARTER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MILLER. Would it be to the personal interest of the agent or not to retain just as much a supervision and control over these Indians as he could?

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman from Minnesota and myself have had some experience along that line, and we know that just as you solve an Indian problem, just as you place an Indian on his responsibilities and remove departmental supervision from him, just that fast you cut off somebody's salary; just that moment must the pay roll be cut down, because there are less men to be supervised, and I want to say frankly and candidly that I have not always seen any very urgent tendency on the part of the employees of any bureau to cut down pay rolls and abolish jobs. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians of the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That the proceeds derived from the sale of any lands hereunder, after reimbursing the United States for the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be paid, share and share alike, to the enrolled members of the tribe."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 9, by inserting after the words "SEC. 3" the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HAWLEY. The language offered to be inserted is the language of the original act.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the words "SEC. 3," insert the following: "That when such lands are surveyed and platted they shall be appraised and sold, except lands reserved for water-power sites, as provided in section 2 of this act, under the provisions of the Revised Statutes covering the sale of the town sites located on the public domain."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, pending that, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "act," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following: "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be paid to or expended for the benefit of the Indians entitled thereto in such manner and for such purposes as he may prescribe."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This amendment is the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, that these funds shall be placed in his hands and parceled out to the Indians as he may deem best for their welfare. I have already spoken in favor of the amendment in general debate, and I do not propose to consume the time of the committee longer.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. The department simply suggests that some of the funds might be very profitably utilized for industrial purposes, and therefore proposes that the bill be amended.

Now, there is no case, I may say, where the Indians are not restricted, where the Government attempts to withhold and supervise the payments of money due them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How many of these Indians are there?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. About 400.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much money is involved?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It will not exceed $150,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. It may not run that much. That is an outside figure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much would that be apiece?

Mr. STAFFORD. About $400.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These Indians have about 116 or 120 head of cattle, all told—those 400 Indians?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They have more than that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of the Interior states the number.

Mr. MANN. They have 3 bulls and 138 cows and heifers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is near enough. I said 120. They may have 150.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that these are not restricted Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care anything about that. We are responsible, and everybody knows that if we give this money to the Indians the white sharps out there will have it inside of six months.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That was not the way with the money that was paid to these Indians 20 years ago under the act of 1892.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not very much to show for it.

Mr. CARTER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York that these Indians are competent Indians. If he will give them this $400 apiece he may not have to complain of their having so little stock in the future.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much do we appropriate for the support of the Siletz Indians?

Mr. CARTER. Nothing at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I mean these Indians affected by this bill.

Mr. CARTER. Those are the Siletz Indians.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do we not provide schools for them?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir. The intention was that these funds should be used for schools, but the Indians have advanced to such an extent that their children are all now in the public schools. They are taxpayers. They own their titles in fee to their land and they have not sold of it, which is a pretty good guaranty of their business qualifications.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This money is only the proceeds of the sale of the lands that were reserved for the purpose of establishing day schools, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. The lands were not reserved for that purpose.

Mr. CARTER. The lands were sold, but the proceeds were to be reserved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the establishment of schools?

Mr. HAWLEY. Not originally.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the department states that there are public schools in which these Indians are and can be educated. Now, what other moneys are derived from the sale of these lands besides this sum? Provision is made for the sale of the land and the proceeds are to be reserved for education, proceeds to which they are entitled and which they will receive.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think they are entitled to all of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the amount of the proceeds from the sale of the land, which money was utilized for school purposes. How much other money are they to get from the sale of these lands?

Mr. HAWLEY. When the reservation was first opened the Government paid them share and share alike, as provided in this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much did it amount to?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not have the figures in mind. I think it ran from $150,000 to $200,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are they an agricultural people?

Mr. HAWLEY. They are an agricultural people. They have their lands in fee simple. They live on their lands. They have farms, houses, and barns, and they have improved their lands. They get most of their living from the land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did they get that money in 1892?

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the transfer was made about 1894 or 1895.

Mr. FITZGERALD. An agricultural people having $150,000 or $200,000 distributed among them 22 years ago now have to show for it 150 head of cattle of all kinds, a decided illustration of their ability to care for themselves.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can show you farms in Oregon that are worth $100,000 on which there is not a head of stock.

Mr. CARTER. These Indians used most of their money in improving their farms, and I understand their farms are in a very good, improved state, when you consider that they are Indian farmers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Oklahoma, the gentleman from Oregon, and the gentleman from South Dakota represent districts in which there are Indians——

Mr. CARTER. And therefore we ought not to be believed on any Indian question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They represent, not the Indians, but the white men who have been despoiling them for years, and these gentlemen are always in favor of turning the money over to the Indians without any control or reservation.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not any warrant on earth for making any such statement as that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes, I have. I have served in this House some time.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; the gentleman has served in this House, but he can not point to anything which warrants such a statement as that. The trouble with the gentleman from New York is that his knowledge and experience with Indians is confined to one tribe, and that is the tribe of Tammany.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the gentleman from Oklahoma I will say that I served six years on the Indian Committee, and I have visited Indian reservations in the gentleman's own State. I asked where I could find Indians in the most primitive condition, the most backward, the most unprogressive, and I was sent into the gentleman's State. I have seen how the Indians there were treated by the rapacious white men who have been robbing them every time and ever since they have had the opportunity. The Osage Indians at that time owed $400,000 to the thieving traders. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know it. There were 1,800 Indians owing between $400,000 and $500,000 to traders.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was asking him a question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to say only a word in answer to what has been said. The Indians received this money, that received from the sale of the general reservation, share and share alike, in what they call the great distribution. They were allotted their lands in fee simple. They used the money to build houses, other buildings, and fences on their lands, and those improvements went immediately on the tax roll of the county. For a period of years they have been supporting themselves. They have raised stock and sold it. They have raised crops and sold them. They are not on the pay roll of the Government. The reserved lands now to be sold were lands reserved for certain purposes, not originally for school purposes, and were reserved in the original act ratifying the treaty. The moneys derived from their sale were set aside for school purposes in the act passed about four years ago, but there is no reason why it should be set aside for school purposes, because the Indians are taxpayers and voters, citizens of Lincoln County, and have paid their proportion of taxes, and more than their proportion in some instances, because they have more money than the whites who have just recently settled on the outside lands, and who have no money with which to begin to make their improvements, and whose entries are not yet perfected and so are not taxable. Their children are going to the public schools. Now, they need this money to add to their buildings, or for fencing, or other improvements, or for stock, and for other purposes, and the money belongs absolutely to them. They have demonstrated their capacity to care for themselves. I ask for a vote, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be voted down.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON. How many Indians are there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Four hundred and thirty-four.

Mr. NORTON. Does that include the children?

Mr. HAWLEY. Of these, 67 are children of school age.

Mr. NORTON. The report or letter of the First Assistant Secretary speaks of the superintendent in charge. Is there a Government superintendent in charge?

Mr. HAWLEY. He is in charge of certain intestate estates over there, if I remember correctly, and some business connected with minors, but not in charge of the Indians.

Mr. NORTON. He is not in charge of the schools there?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are no Government schools there. These Indians go to the public schools of Lincoln County. There are 14 of these public schools in the reservation.

Mr. NORTON. Supported by the county?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. And the superintendent has no charge over the Indians?

Mr. HAWLEY. Excepting the minor matters that I have mentioned. And I wish to emphasize the fact that I never heard that adventurers of any kind obtained the moneys, or any part of them, that were distributed in the original distribution of moneys received from the sale of the reservation to the Government. If there had been flagrant actions of that sort, I am sure I would have heard of them.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I heard my name mentioned a few moments ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and again by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It is immaterial to me what the gentleman from Illinois may have stated, but I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to state that I had tried to defeat or interfere with the passage of this bill. Of course that statement is not true, Mr. Chairman, in any sense.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, far from stating anything of that kind——

Mr. DONOVAN. I understood the gentleman to say that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. If the gentleman will permit, I will disabuse his mind entirely of any idea that I made any such charge. What I did say was that the gentleman by reason of his obstructionist tactics was seeking to prevent the information being disclosed that would safeguard the Indians.

Mr. DONOVAN. Obstructionist tactics? I wish to deny that as well. Mr. Chairman, this afternoon and last Friday afternoon there seems to have been a concerted action to talk against time. A simple bill comes up, and the Speaker asks if there is objection to its consideration. They take up half an hour, and at the end of that time, as a rule, object, after hearing themselves talk for half an hour. This bill was a simple thing, and after they had talked for about 15 minutes I rose and addressed the Chair and called for the regular order. That is not obstruction. It calls for business, and business only, and now the gentleman says that that is obstruction. With his intelligence, and the number of years that he has been here, it does him harm. He understands the meaning of the word "obstruction." Calling for the regular order calls for action, instead of delay and filibustering. Last Friday two or three over there on the Republican side were filibustering all of the time for the purpose of defeating bills that were not in sight nor up for action.

As to the animus and the objectionable part of it, as it appears in the mind of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I have nothing whatever to say. He drivels and he loves to wallow in that kind of drivel. He loves to wallow, and his tongue is only at home when he is abusing somebody. They have all had a taste of it, and most of them run to cover after the style of a Shanghai rooster in the barnyard. But I welcome any of his attacks. I welcome any of his abuse at any time or under any circumstances. I can stand the drivel at all times, Mr. Chairman, but I have never taken any part in any legislative proceedings here except for the purpose of expediting business, or for the purpose of fair play, or for the purpose of honest performance of duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will be agreed to.

This bill was referred to the Department of the Interior, which made a report upon it. In the report attention is called to the fact that the superintendent in charge among these Indians has heretofore suggested to the Indian Office the advisability of purchasing breeding stock and material for improvement and advancement of the fruit industry. He states that it is very probable that some of the funds in question might be very profitably utilized for industrial improvements. Therefore the department suggested the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], to insert a provision that in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior the money may be paid to the Indians entitled thereto or expended for their benefit in such manner and for such purposes as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. This money comes from the sale of lands, the proceeds of which were reserved for the purchase of sites for schools and the erection of the necessary school buildings thereon.

At present it appears there are ample public schools in which these Indians are being educated, so that it is not necessary to reserve the proceeds of these lands for the purchase of school sites and the erection of school buildings. The department suggests, however, that hereafter a situation may arise where that may be necessary. From this report it appears evident that the superintendent among the Indians has heretofore suggested to the department, in effect, that an appeal be made to Congress for a gratuity appropriation in order to provide the necessary stock, implements, and improvements necessary to make the Indians self-sustaining and prosperous. Attention is called to the fact that there is a considerable amount of grazing land in the hills which belongs to them. Comment is made upon the fact that the amount of cattle is comparatively small for 300 Indians. The bill as reported provides for the payment of this $150,000 outright to these Indians, share and share alike. The amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes that this money shall either be paid to the Indians or be expended for their benefit, in the discretion of the department. Under the bill as now before the House, it makes no difference whether the Indians be incompetent or worthless or even not industrious, they will get their pro rata of payment and some of them will squander it.

If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin be adopted, the industrious, competent, capable Indain undoubtedly, as the practice of the department has been under such legislation, will have paid to him the money to be utilized in the manner best for himself or for his own interests, while the shares of the incompetent or thriftless, instead of being turned over to them to be squandered, will be expended by the department for their benefit and in their interest. What excuse can there be to turn this $150,000 over to these Indians indiscriminately, regardless of their capacity? Why not do what the department suggests, put it in the discretion of the department? It has the information which we have not, to determine whether to expend the money or to pay it out as the case of each individual Indian may demand. Why turn it over to be squandered by the thriftless and to be utilized by the industrious? Why not see that the entire amount is expended in a manner that will best advance and promote their interests? We maintain the great Department of the Interior, with a great Indian Office, for the purpose of protecting the Indians, keeping them from becoming a charge upon the taxpayers of the United States, conserving their property, and looking after the proper expenditure of their funds. Why not abolish the office and turn all of the enormous sum now in the Treasury over to them, regardless of their capacity? That is what is proposed in this case. The administration suggests that the money be placed under the care and scrutiny of the administration officials, so that the obligation of the Government as a trustee and a guardian of the Indians may properly be performed and the money expended for their benefit. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 1608. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto"; and

H. R. 11745. An act to provide for the certificate of title to homestead entry by a female American citizen who has intermarried with an alien.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution to amend S. J. Res. 34, approved May 12, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States."

SILETZ INDIAN RESERVATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact that all debate is exhausted on this amendment. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD), there were—ayes 21, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Moss of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15803, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon moves the previous question and amendment to final passage.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 7.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 25, noes 27.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] demands tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

The SPEAKER. The vote is—ayes 25, noes 27; and the House declines to adjourn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, were there not enough Members to order tellers?

Mr. MANN. It takes one-fifth of a quorum to order tellers.

The SPEAKER. It takes one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. MANN. And here we are because of the brilliant leadership on your side of the House.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was just going to tell him that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think it is apparent that we can not get a quorum here to-night. I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. MANN. The House has just voted down a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but there is only one of two things to do.

Mr. MANN. There has been no business transacted since.

The SPEAKER. We can not transact business without a quorum, and there are only two motions that can be entertained. One is a motion to adjourn and one is for a call of the House. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the motion to adjourn, just having been voted down, can not be renewed at once without something else having transpired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any ruling that does not authorize a motion to adjourn to be made immediately after the defeat of another one, except on a proposition as to whether the motion is dilatory. If the gentleman wants to make that point of order, it is for the Speaker to determine whether my motion is dilatory or not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of order, in view of the great leadership shown on that side of the House before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] came in. They do not know whether they are in or not; they do not know whether or not they are in the city.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, August 18, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Yalobusha River, Miss., up to Grenada (H. Doc. No. 1145); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Grand River, Mich. (H. Doc. No. 1146); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FALCONER: A bill (H. R. 18399) providing for relief of settlers on unsurveyed railroad lands; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. DEITRICK: A bill (H. R. 18400) prohibiting the acceptance of any unreasonable prices for any goods, wares, merchandise, or products of the soil or mines; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18401) regulating the exportation of goods, wares, merchandise, or products of the soil or mines; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BELL of California: A bill (H. R. 18402) to provide for the erection of a public building at Long Beach, Cal.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BRITTEN: Resolution (H. Res. 595) authorizing the Secretary of State to communicate with the Japanese Government that the United States views with concern the issuance of its ultimatum to Germany; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. McKELLAR: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 322) to amend Senate joint resolution 34, approved May 12, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States"; to the Committee on Claims.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAIR: A bill (H. R. 18403) granting a pension to Charles E. Faux; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 18404) granting a pension to Sara Gates; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRUMBAUGH: A bill (H. R. 18405) to correct the military record of Thomas J. Corriell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GUDGER: A bill (H. R. 18406) granting a pension to Annie Fredericka Pope Bowles; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HOBSON: A bill (H. R. 18407) granting an increase of pension to James Wiginton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 18408) granting an increase of pension to George Ulmer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 18409) granting a pension to Ella E. Swift; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. THOMAS: A bill (H. R. 18410) granting a pension to Ellen T. Harris; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18411) granting an increase of pension to Frank R. Porter; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18412) granting an increase of pension to James Blackburn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18413) granting an increase of pension to James H. McPherson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18414) granting an increase of pension to Robert Farmer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18415) granting an increase of pension to Isaac Bell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18416) granting an increase of pension to William Forgy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ALLEN: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce, Cincinnati, Ohio, approving amendment to the law limiting liability of vessels; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. HAMILTON of New York: Petition of sundry citizens of Tunesassa, N. Y., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. HINDS: Petitions of sundry citizens and church organizations of the State of Maine, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of the executive committee of the Chamber of Commerce of Washington, D. C., protesting against the passage of Senate bill 1624, regulating the construction of buildings along alleyways in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Petition of various business men of Murray, Nebr., favoring the passage of House bill 5308, relative to taxing mail-order houses; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'LEARY: Petitions of sundry citizens of Queens County, N. Y., protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. TREADWAY: Memorial of the Pittsfield (Mass.) Board of Trade, opposing legislation affecting American business; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 18, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 11, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smoot
Brady	James	Overman	Sterling
Bryan	Johnson	Penrose	Stone
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Thomas
Camden	Kenyon	Pittman	Thornton
Chamberlain	Kern	Poindexter	West
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Pomerene	White
Culberson	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Williams
Cummins	McCumber	Shafroth
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard
Gallinger	Myers	Simmons

Mr. BRYAN. My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to state that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce a pair between the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and his pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

I will also state that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SWANSON and Mr. TILLMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. COLT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire briefly to address an inquiry to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] or to the acting chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

I suppose nearly every Senator in this body, regardless of party, is besieged by visitors and in receipt of a large number of telegrams and communications regarding the river and harbor bill. It is a measure of overwhelming importance to nearly every State in the Union. The failure to pass the bill would cause great distress and great actual loss in the delay in pending improvements.

If I may be permitted, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana whether it is the purpose of the majority in this Chamber to bring up the river and harbor bill before we adjourn this session and have it considered and endeavor to pass it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania I will say that it was announced some time ago authoritatively and correctly that the majority had determined that the river and harbor bill should be disposed of before the adjournment of the present session. There has been no change in that determination.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, in that purpose the majority will have at least my cooperation, and I have no doubt that of a large part of my colleagues in the minority, to pass the bill at the earliest possible date.

Mr. KERN. There was no agreement that the bill should be passed, but that it should be disposed of.

Mr. BORAH. The bill will not likely pass hurriedly. It is a very important bill and should be discussed thoroughly.

Mr. PENROSE. I can not hear the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I say the river and harbor bill will not pass hurriedly through the Senate. There are some of us over here who are quite in favor of a river and harbor bill, but some of these projects will have to be eliminated before the bill gets through with any degree of haste.

Mr. PENROSE. I take it for granted that in bringing up the bill no Senator is pledged to any details. I hope, however, the Senator from Idaho does not contemplate any murderous assault on the Delaware River or the head of the Ohio.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, in order that there may be no misapprehension from the remark I made, I will state that it was not determined by the majority that any particular river and harbor bill should be passed, but that the river and harbor bill in some form should be disposed of before the adjournment of the session.

Of course, it is understood by many of those who took part in that arrangement that there might be amendments; that there might be eliminations, but the bill in some form will be disposed of.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to the program. "Some form" is a very emphatic portion of the program, however.

Mr. PENROSE. I take it the Senator from Idaho is heartily in favor of all irrigation projects.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and if the Senator from Pennsylvania would put into the river and harbor bill a provision that the money appropriated should be paid back this bill would be killed in very short order by the votes of the men who are now supporting it.

Mr. PENROSE. I know that repayments are always unpopular.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I feel constrained to call for the regular order.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order being called for, the Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 15657.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 6, line 12, as amended.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I desire to address myself this morning to the so-called labor provisions of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that we have not yet reached the labor provisions of the bill, and if it would suit him just as well I would be glad if he would postpone his remarks until we reach that section. We are on section 6.

Mr. POMERENE. If that is the desire of the chairman, I will defer my remarks until later.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would be glad if that would be done.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like during the day to speak upon that matter as soon as the section is reached.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator certainly will have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. POMERENE. Under those circumstances I will yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, on page 6, line 12, as amended.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, on page 6, I move to strike out the words "in equity," in line 13, so that a final judgment or decree may be used as evidence regardless of whether or not the suit was in equity. I see no reason why a distinction should be made between a common-law suit, a criminal prosecution, and a suit in equity in the use of the record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Florida that it would be better, and make it clearer, if, after the language in line 12, instead of striking out the words "in equity" there were inserted the words "in any criminal prosecution or."

Mr. BRYAN. That is perfectly satisfactory, Mr. President; it accomplishes the same purpose, I think. If my amendment to the amendment should prevail, it would read:

That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any suit or proceeding.

Certainly a criminal prosecution is a suit; and the language then would cover all classes of suits, whether they be criminal prosecutions or common-law suits or suits in equity, by simply striking out the words "in equity." I have no objection, however, if the Senator prefers his amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. We do not ordinarily refer to a criminal prosecution as a suit, I think.

Mr. BORAH. We would not refer to a criminal prosecution as a suit.

Mr. BRYAN. I have always heard it so referred to. I never heard it questioned that it was a suit.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, well, it is not a suit in the sense in which we use that term in referring to a suit in equity.

Mr. BRYAN. However, I am not particular about the phraseology. I think it ought to be so that a record in a criminal suit or prosecution could be used in a subsequent proceeding with the same force and effect as if it had been a suit in equity.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the matter suggested by the Senator from Florida—though I am not sure that I am in accord with him—would be covered by inserting, in line 13, between the words "in" and "equity," the words "law or," so that it would read "proceeding in law or equity," and after the word "equity" by inserting "or in any prosecution."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, that is practically the same language as suggested by the chairman of the committee. I understand his suggestion is, in line 12, after the word "rendered," to insert "in any criminal prosecution or," so that it would read:

That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity.

I am not at all particular about the phraseology.

Mr. REED. Leave out the words "in equity," and let it read "any suit or proceeding." That would cover any kind of proceeding.

Mr. BRYAN. That was my motion.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is no suit authorized by any of these statutes by the United States except a criminal prosecution or a suit in equity. The United States does not bring a suit at law for damages.

Mr. BRYAN. It occurs to me, Mr. President, that if the words "in equity" were stricken out, so that it would read "rendered in any suit or proceeding brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws," it would be as broad as the antitrust law itself; but I am not interested in the phraseology. So I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, and adopt his language, and offer it, withdrawing my first amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, in the committee amendment, in line 12, after the word "rendered," it is proposed to insert the words "in any criminal prosecution or," so that, if amended as proposed, it will read:

That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that now brings up the question of whether we shall adhere to the House provision or adopt the provision recommended by the Senate committee; in other words, whether we shall make the judgment in the proceedings in which it is decreed that the defendant is a trust in violation of the statute conclusive, or whether it shall be held as prima facie evidence of the facts. I feel like taking the time of the Senate for just a few moments more this morning upon that question.

It will be borne in mind, first, that if you make it prima facie evidence only you leave entirely open every question of law that was litigated and determined in the original proceeding; you leave the question of fact open as well. You simply throw the burden of proof upon the defendant, when otherwise it would be upon the plaintiff. That is the whole force and effect of the statute that you are proposing to pass—simply to transfer the burden of proof.

As was well said in the editorial read from the desk yesterday, the whole purpose of the proposed statute is emasculated; its whole effect is destroyed. You are really giving nothing, for all practical purposes, by the provision here inserted.

I indicated yesterday that, in my judgment, in the prosecution of one of these cases the United States prosecutes as the representative of all of its citizens, and that there is no violation at all of legal principles when any one of its citizens subsequently takes advantage of the adjudication that is made in the primary suit.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. There is just one question right at that point which I should like to ask the Senator, and that is where that would leave an alien who might become interested, the same as a citizen?

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps the word "citizen" is not technically correct. The United States brings the action in behalf of anybody who might be interested, which would include everybody who may claim the protection of this Government.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator gave more significance to the word "citizen" than he really intended.

Mr. WALSH. I did not use it in any technical sense.

I was going to say that this principle has received so broad an application that it has even been held when a judgment is taken against a town that judgment may be enforced by satisfaction out of the private property of the citizen of the town by virtue of a statute so providing. Indeed, Mr. President, that is the ordinary way of satisfying a judgment taken against the town in most of the New England States. It is a practice that prevails in Massachusetts and in the State of Maine. When a suit is instituted against a town every taxpayer of the town is so far included in the proceedings that execution may issue in the action, and his property may be levied upon. Not only that, Mr. President, we are not seeking to make a judgment operative against a citizen, but it is simply an estoppel against the defendant who has had his trial, who has had his day in court.

I want to add, Mr. President, that, in my estimation, constitutional rights are rights that are simply of substance; they do not include mere procedure or forms of law. Those may be changed at the will of the legislative body so long as the substance of the right is not destroyed.

Now, what is the constitutional provision which it is said is transgressed by legislation of this character? It is no other than the rule that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. What is due process of law? Webster defines it as that law which hears before it condemns. In these cases the party has been heard; he has had every opportunity to defend against the claim, and the bill simply provides that when he has had that opportunity and the judgment has gone against him it shall be available not only to the United States, who is a party to the proceedings, but to any citizen of the United States or denizen of the country who desires to take advantage of it. I do not conceive, Mr. President, that this can be of the substance of the right at all. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I do not propose to argue this question, but I wish to suggest that the statement of the rule of prima facie evidence announced by the Senator from Montana is not so strong as that which the law books lay down. In other words, as I understand, the Senator says that the effect of the committee amendment will only be to shift the burden of proof, whereas the rule as announced by the Supreme Court of the United States is to the general effect that prima facie evidence is such evidence as will support a judgment at law, either criminal or civil, against those whom the rule of prima facie evidence is sought to be invoked, unless rebutted by contrary evidence.

I call attention to an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States on that question, reported in the Two hundred and nineteenth United States, in the case of Bailey against the State of Alabama, page 234, and I will read the paragraph to which I refer:

Prima facie evidence is sufficient evidence to outweigh the presumption of innocence, and if not met by opposing evidence to support a verdict of guilty. "It is such as in judgment of law is sufficient to establish the fact, and if not rebutted remains sufficient for the purpose." Kelly v. Jackson (6 Pet., 632).

Mr. President, in view of that rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States, and in view of the trend of the decisions of that court to the effect that we can not make a judgment conclusive in which the party claiming it was not a party to the original judgment, I suggest that it is at least dangerous to insert such a doctrine in important legislation of this kind.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to have this section read just as the Senator from Montana desires it to read, and I have a very high regard for his judgment of the law. I must say, however, that I am unable to bring myself to the conclusion that we are not treading upon dangerous ground. I do not say that it might not be possible to sustain that position, but we must find, it seems to me, or ought to find, some distinct precedent for it before we insert it in this bill. There are a number of precedents, although not clearly upon the matter as it is here presented, of course, which would lead us to the conclusion that it would not be constitutional, and I am rather inclined to share the view of the Senator from Texas that for that reason we ought not to tread upon that dangerous ground. I think it is safer to proceed upon the other theory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana requests the yeas and nays on the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana his construction of this section. The section reads as now amended:

That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Does the Senator from Montana believe that under that language as it now stands the judgment of the court as to the law involved would be binding as prima facie evidence in the same way that a judgment as to the facts would be binding?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, of course the language says that it shall be prima facie as to all of the matters determined, but the term "prima facie" is not properly applied at all as to the legal principles.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator desire to have the judgment made conclusive both as to the law and the facts?

Mr. WALSH. I do, of course.

Mr. REED. Now, let me put this question to the Senator——

Mr. WALSH. I criticize this provision because you give no effect whatever to the principles of law that have been settled in the primary suit. Every proposition of law is open on the second action.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, the position of the Senator from Montana is that a judgment having been once rendered between the Government and any defendant should thereafter be conclusive in any other suit brought by any other party both as to every question of law and every question of fact involved in the original suit; that is what he desires to accomplish.

What I am saying is not by way of controversy, but to try to clear up this matter. Let me suppose this kind of a case: Let us suppose that an action is brought in a United States circuit court against an individual or corporation for violating the antitrust act; that in that action the court declares the law to be a certain way; that the case is decided against the defendant, and that, thereupon, an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States affirms the decree, so that it is a final judgment between the parties. Thereafter an individual brings a suit against the same defendant; but in the meantime the Supreme Court of the United States in another case has absolutely reversed its position upon the law and has held the law as it declared it to be in the case just cited in my illustration to be bad law.

Now, under those circumstances would the Senator say that for all time the bad law declared in that case should be forever enforced against that defendant?

Mr. WALSH. I will answer the Senator by saying that that is just exactly what would happen. Notwithstanding the Supreme Court might subsequently reverse its decision, that bad law would at all times be enforced against the original defendant, and he would be enjoined by the final decree in that action from doing the very things which subsequently the Supreme Court in another case would allow the defendant in that case to continue to do.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; the Senator, I think, is inaccurate. It is true that if I have a suit with A, and he defeats me, and final judgment is rendered, the fact that that final judgment is an erroneous and bad judgment and that the law is afterwards otherwise declared does not relieve me of the hardship of bowing to and conforming to that decision. That rule exists, because it is said in the law that there must be an end to litigation. That binds me in that one case; but the fact that I must suffer the hardship of obeying a judgment which is founded upon erroneous considerations in the case I have with A is no reason why, when the law is correctly declared, B, C, D, and E should be enabled to bottom their cases upon a principle which the courts have afterwards declared is a wrong principle. You are extending it. Now, if you make the judgment prima facie, then, of course, as to questions of law, if there is afterwards a reversal of the point—not of the case, but of the law declared in the case—the remedy is there.

The Senator understands perfectly my feeling. I want to make this law as strong as he wants to make it, and he wants to make it as strong as I do. If, however, we were to put into this law a provision making the judgment absolutely conclusive, and if a case such as I have used in my illustration were brought before a court, would not a court be very likely to say: "You are deprived of your day in court; you are deprived of due process of law, because in litigation which did not exist at all at the time the first action was decided you are compelled to submit to a rule of law which is no longer the law of this land"? Indeed, Mr. President, are we not in danger, even if the decision were based upon a statute, and the statute were afterwards repealed, of seeking to bind a defendant conclusively and for all time by a decision bottomed upon such a statute?

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I desire to say that you can not possibly minimize the wrong and the hardship that is suffered as the result of a final decision of a court against a man in a case in which the court eventually reaches the conclusion that it was wrong. The man against whom the judgment goes has no redress. He may lose his entire estate, and the law affords no remedy whatever to him. You can not urge that this provision is not sound by supposing a case in which an additional hardship will be wrought where the court originally decides erroneously.

That is all I care to say about the matter; but while I am on my feet I should like to say to the Senator from Idaho——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. WEST. Before the Senator passes from that subject, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to recur to it, if the Senator will pardon me.

I should like to say to the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Texas that they need give themselves no deep concern about the possibility of our being wrong about this matter. I was interrogated the other day by the Senator from North Carolina as to whether it was within the power of the legislature to make a tax deed conclusive evidence. I indicated my view about the matter, that it is within the power of the legislature to make the tax deed conclusive of every fact, except such facts as go to the groundwork of the tax; but statutes have been passed which have undertaken thus to make the tax deed conclusive as to every fact recited in the deed; and what has been the holding? It has been that it will not be conclusive evidence, but it will be merely prima facie evidence of the existence of those facts. So, Mr. President, if we should adopt the House provision, declaring that the judgment shall be conclusive, and there are constitutional objections to that, the court will give all the force it can to the statute; namely, it will make it just exactly as the Senators want it—prima facie evidence.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that would be clearly imposing upon the court the duty of legislating—something for which the courts are being very much criticized these days, although often without justification. The Legislature here has up the question whether it shall make a judgment or decree of this kind prima facie or conclusive evidence. We reject the proposition of making it prima facie, and we say that it shall be conclusive. Shall the court have the right to assume that if we could not make it conclusive we would have made it prima facie? In any event I feel that it is our duty to exercise our judgment and not shift responsibility.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that we are trying to make it as valuable as evidence as we can, and the court does not legislate at all. It says that we went further than we had any right to go, but it will give it effect so far as constitutional principles will permit.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator another question?—because I am going to support the Senator if I become convinced of the legal proposition, and the Senator has great capacity to convince people. Has the Senator any authority or decision, other than those he has cited, with reference to making a judgment against a town conclusive against a citizen of the town? I can see a relationship existing between the citizen and the town which does not exist here. Has the Senator any authority, or has there been any decision, sustaining the proposition, except in the cases where there is a relationship between the citizen and the town, or where there is a distinct rule which applies with reference to tax deeds?

We all know that the courts have said that with reference to tax deeds a rule will be applied which does not apply elsewhere, because of the absolute necessity of the Government having a hasty method of collecting its taxes, and to protect those who take the chance of buying tax deeds; but unless there is some other authority than those I should still feel the matter to be in doubt.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I said on yesterday to the Senator that a very diligent search had failed to reveal any decision which seemed to me bore directly upon the proposition, either one way or the other.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty of the situation here, it seems to me, is that there is no privity between these parties as there is between the town and its citizen. He is represented in a certain sense there. He is a member of a municipal corporation, a legal entity. He helps to elect the officers. They represent him. He helps to elect the city attorney. He represents him; and there is a certain privity which the courts have found sufficient to sustain that kind of a judgment.

Mr. WALSH. We are supposed to elect a President of the United States, and thereby the Attorney General as well. Can the Senator see any distinction in principle?

Mr. BORAH. I see quite a distinction between electing a President of the United States and having him appoint an Attorney General, and myself as a citizen, where I am a taxpayer, electing the members of an organization of which I am a member. In one instance I am a member of the body politic; in the other I am a member of a legally constituted municipal corporation.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator contributes to the support of the General Government just the same as he does to the support of the local government.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but the law contemplates that when residing in a city I am a member of a legal entity, a member of a corporation, and that the legal entity represents me the same way as it does the stockholders in other instances; and that is a reason, in my judgment, why the law has thus gone to such an extent in those instances. I confess that I am arguing this matter, however, without having made any examination of the authorities, and simply upon original principles.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad now to answer the question of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, injected here it would hardly be pertinent to the subject which was discussed, so I shall not propound the question now.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in many instances I think the provisions of the House bill contended for by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] would be useful; but there may be circumstances where it would work great hardship and it may be true—and I am afraid it is true—that it would be unconstitutional. I am afraid we are undertaking to exercise judicial power. When we say that certain facts or certain conclusions are binding on those who are not parties to the litigation, it occurs to me that we are exercising judicial power or invading the domain of the judiciary. If we can do that, can we not deny persons their right to be heard their day in court, as it is termed? And if we do that of course we invade the judicial province.

If we adopt the provisions of the House bill contended for by the Senator from Montana, we are putting ourselves in conflict with a long and well-established principle, a principle that was founded in the common law, namely, that judgments and decrees should bind only parties and privies. Evidently that is founded upon reason; and while we may not have had transmitted to us the reasons on which the principle is grounded we have had the principle itself handed down. It is a principle, as I have said, that had its foundation in the common law, and has existed up to this time. Now, we are changing that. We are declaring by this bill that these judgments and decrees shall be binding upon persons who are not parties or privies to the litigation.

There are good reasons why persons not parties or privies to the action should not be bound. There may be cases where the consequences are insignificant as between the immediate parties involved; for that reason little attention may be given them. It may not be of such vital importance as it afterwards becomes in a controversy between others not then parties to the suit. New burdens may be thrust upon the losing party to the litigation not contemplated or the consequences of which could not have been foreseen at the first trial. I think we ought to be careful and considerate before taking this step.

Again, Mr. President, the fact that we can find no precedent for this legislation either in England or in this country, either by Congress or by the legislatures of the several States, is to me a strong argument why the provisions of the House should not be adopted. If this kind of legislation is beneficial, if it is proper, if it is constitutional, why is it that this legislative weapon has never before been used? I think its disuse through the ages is a strong argument against its use to-day. It is a new field upon which we are entering, a field upon which I hesitate to enter.

Mr. President, another thing: I do not know just what courts have held. If, as the Senator contends, in case the conclusive effect intended can not be given to the act it will be given prima facie effect, I would think better of it. Of course, if I was convinced that the Supreme Court of the United States had or would so decide, that would remove the fear I have on this subject, and that fear is this, that the act will be declared unconstitutional and litigants will lose, because we can not make it conclusive, the prima facie effect of these judgments and decrees which they will have if the committee amendment is adopted. To make the decrees or the judgments of the court prima facie evidence is of vast importance to the litigants of the country. After long years of experience in active practice, I believe, Mr. President, that as many cases are lost or won upon the question as to who shall carry the burden of proof as are lost or won upon a consideration of all the evidence in the case.

Then, Mr. President, as has been said, it is burdensome enough to require parties to the litigation themselves to be bound by the findings of a court or jury in a particular case. So many things that we can not at the time possibly foresee influence such decisions. The way in which the evidence is produced may have its effect upon a jury or a court.

The manner in which the case is handled by the lawyers employed may determine in the mind of a jury or a court what the verdict or the judgment shall be, and yet, Mr. President, those things should probably not have been controlling influences in the conclusions reached. It is hard enough, sir, to make them binding forever upon the parties and the privies to the suit. It is possible that because of the inability of one of the parties to obtain evidence the verdict or judgment was rendered in the way it was, and that it would not have been rendered in that way if the missing evidence had been obtained. One of the parties may have been required to submit his case to a jury upon a showing, as we lawyers term it, which produced the proper effect upon the mind of the judge, but which was not worth the paper upon which it was written when it came to producing an impression upon the mind of a jury.

All these things, I say, argue strongly against making these judgments and decrees binding upon anyone except the parties to the suit. It would not be made binding upon them for a moment if it were not for a public necessity. Courts would not hesitate, they never would have hesitated, to have relieved against wrong and injustice but for the fact that in doing it they would have wronged society by removing from the judgments and decrees the stability that they must have in the interest of society.

Mr. President, in my own State—and I use this as an illustration—our supreme court properly held that when it had once decided a case, ever afterwards, when that case was being considered by the court on a subsequent appeal, the decision first rendered in the case was the law of that case, even though the decision was overruled in some other case; thus the court found itself in the position of having to say that that case which had been overruled was binding in the one case when not binding in any other case. To avoid the hardships imposed by this situation, our legislature enacted a law declaring that the supreme court should no longer adhere to any such rule as that, and that in the future consideration of that case it should be treated as any other case here.

Mr. President, it is with regret that I can not go with the Senator from Montana in supporting the provisions of the House bill. I see in some instances that great good might result from such a course; but I fear that greater harm may come. I fear, too, that it may be unconstitutional, and I fear that we may lose that which we will get by adopting the committee amendment—that is, the prima facie effect of these judgments and decrees. I will therefore vote for the committee amendment.

Mr. WEST. Before the Senator from Alabama takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question. As prima facie evidence, would decrees or judgments rendered change the burden of proof in a subsequent case? I notice the Senator alluded to it a few moments ago in his remarks.

Mr. WHITE. Of course, the judgment and decree rendered in a case would be prima facie evidence under the committee amendment in the cases mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. WEST. But would it shift the burden of proof in any subsequent case?

Mr. WHITE. It would shift the burden of proof in all cases covered by the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall vote to sustain the amendment proposed by the committee, although I have grave doubt with respect to its efficiency in accomplishing any great, or even material, good. It would be impossible for me to vote for the proposal in the House bill, first, because I doubt very much its constitutionality, and, second, because I have never been able to understand one feature of the House provision. It is this, that on a decree in any suit in equity brought under the antitrust laws in which a final judgment has been rendered and in which it has been found "that a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce, or has monopolized or attempted to monopolize or combined with any person or persons to monopolize any part of commerce, in violation of any of the antitrust laws, said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts."

I have racked my mind in vain to imagine any other proceeding that could be brought by the United States in which the former judgment would operate as an estoppel, and I have been unable to conceive how, therefore, the House provision would make the former judgment or decree evidence of anything, inasmuch as I can not imagine how it could be evidence either for or against the United States in any subsequent proceeding. I know no other proceeding which the United States could institute against that defendant upon that cause of action or any other like it.

But there is another objection to it, and the objection I now state is in a measure an objection against the committee amendment. Whenever we pass this provision we will have effectually put an end to all consent decrees. More than one-half, I fancy, of all the decrees which have been entered adjudging that a defendant or defendants have been guilty of a violation of the antitrust laws—I mean those suits against commercial and industrial organizations—have been entered by consent. The defendant or defendants have been willing to cease to do the thing which they were charged with doing and they agreed to a decree, they submitted to the general policy enforced by the Department of Justice, and they are enjoined against a continuation of these practices.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the Senator suppose that they gave consent to these decrees because they knew that the same end would be reached in a trial?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not always. I think in many cases they have been willing to abandon the courses or practices which they have pursued in order to avoid litigation and because the profit in so doing was not sufficient to warrant the trial. But if that consent decree is to be made conclusive evidence in favor of any plaintiff that might thereafter sue the defendant for damages, it goes without saying that the defendant in the Government suit would insist upon a complete trial and a vindication if possible.

I think that a code of business morals has grown up partially through these consent decrees, and that it would be very unfortunate from a high standpoint of public policy to say that these decrees should be conclusive evidence against the defendant of all the things that were charged in the bill of complaint and which may have been covered by the decree. I think it would be far better to make the judgment or decree prima facie evidence. I am a little at sea with regard to just what that means. All these great combinations which have been adjudged guilty of violations of the antitrust law have been guilty of a series of acts, thousands of acts, which joined together constitute a restraint of trade. Very few, I think, have been adjudged guilty of a violation of the law because of any single act.

When a decree is rendered, therefore, holding that there has been a combination in restraint of trade, of what particular act does that decree become either conclusive or prima facie evidence? Take the Standard Oil Co., for instance. It is a prolific illustration. One of the things that it did was to reduce prices in a given locality in order to eliminate a competitor who may have arisen in that locality. That was one thing that this great corporation did and did repeatedly, and it is one of the things, taken with a hundred others, for which it was condemned in the decree of the court. Now, let me turn to the antitrust law. I should like to know precisely what the application of this provision would be. Section 7 declares:

> That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation, by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this act, may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States and recover threefold damages.

Suppose that this competitor who had been driven out of business on account of a reduction in price in a particular locality were to sue the Standard Oil Co. to recover damages, of what would the decree that was rendered in the suit against the Standard Oil Co. be—conclusive evidence or prima facie evidence? It would be prima facie evidence, we may assume, of the fact or the compound of law and fact that the Standard Oil Co. had throughout the United States and in all its practices been guilty of a violation of the antitrust law. But in order to recover the person injured must show that he was injured by reason of something forbidden or declared unlawful by the act.

Now, if the thing was a single transaction, if it was a single act, there would be no difficulty about it; but when the thing forbidden, or the thing of which the Standard Oil Co. was found guilty, is a long series of acts and combinations and incorporations, it is my opinion that what we propose to do now, whether we make it prima facie evidence or whether we make it conclusive evidence, will be of little avail to the person who sues to recover. I think he will still have to show that the thing by which he was hurt was a violation of the antitrust law, and in nine cases out of ten the decree does not adjudge that that particular thing was a violation of the antitrust law. I should like in some way, although I do not know how we could do it, to make it much clearer than it is.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that I assume that in all of these cases findings of fact are made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. It may be charged, for instance, that local price cutting was practiced with intent to drive Jones or Smith or some one else out of business, and——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there are very few cases in which there are findings of fact of the sort the Senator from Montana has in mind.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the case, the rule of implied findings would apply.

Mr. CUMMINS. The court reviews the evidence generally, the history of the defendant corporation, and says that all its history shows a violation of the antitrust law or a restraint of trade or an attempt to monopolize. I have never been able to see just how that opinion or that finding or that decree in the case in which the whole field was surveyed could be made available to a particular person who may have been injured by a particular act, which act, taken in connection with all the other acts, constitutes a restraint of trade, but which, taken alone, may not so constitute a restraint of trade.

However, I am expressing that view simply because I did not want it hereafter to be said that I, at least, thought that this section either as passed by the other House or as reported by the Senate committee would solve the problem or would render to the persons who have been injured by specific acts of an offending corporation the relief to which they are entitled, if we could conceive any way to award it to them.

In concluding, Mr. President, I will say that I think it is much better to go slowly with the movement, at any rate, and not to tempt total failure by making a judgment conclusive evidence in the face of the doubt that so many lawyers feel with respect to our power in that respect.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think this is a question presenting many grave difficulties, and that it is one that we ought to approach in as calm and judicial a spirit as possible. There can be no difference of opinion among the friends of this bill as to the object which we desire to attain, but in seeking to attain that object it is entirely possible we may defeat our purposes by endeavoring to do something which we are without power to do; or, again, we may defeat our object in its spirit by doing something which is ill-advised.

I grant that in the ordinary case a judgment, having been rendered, might well be made conclusive if we do not run counter to the principle that we are denying the individual his day in court. I do not think that question is without its doubts.

What is meant by your day in court? I think that when a court comes to consider the question of whether a litigant has had his day in court the court is likely to take the position that that expression has a pretty well defined meaning in the law, and that it means in the case where the judgment is about to be rendered that the litigant must be entitled to his full right to put in his evidence and take the judgment of a court or jury upon the facts thus presented in that particular case.

When you simply provide by law that a certain condition of facts shall constitute a prima facie case you do not violate the rule, because the individual still has his right to overcome that evidence, to fight that question out, and to take the judgment of a court or jury upon the whole case. When you make it conclusive a different question is presented.

I am not going to arrogate to myself such wisdom as to say that if you do make it conclusive you are necessarily impinging upon the constitutional right of a citizen, but it occurs to me that it is an exceedingly dangerous thing to do, and that we may by attempting to do too much succeed in doing nothing. When, however, on the other hand, we use the term "prima facie" I think we use a term that is too weak.

When we come to the definitions of "prima facie" we find they vary. I can illustrate that. In "Words and Phrases" I find this definition:

> A prima facie case is that state of facts which entitles the party to have the case go to the jury.

If that were the universal rule, I think I could be content with this language as it now is in the bill. Again it is said:

> Making it a prima facie case does not necessarily or usually change the burden of proof. A prima facie case is that amount of evidence which would be sufficient to counterbalance the general presumption of innocence, and warrant a conviction if not then encountered and controlled by evidence tending to contradict it and render it improbable, or to prove other facts inconsistent with it.

There we come to a very dangerous doctrine. If a prima facie case is made by laying down the decree in a trust suit, and it is sufficient to enable the party who has produced that decree to go to the court or jury, no matter what other evidence is produced, and to have that evidence considered by the jury and to have it regarded by the court as sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the court, well and good; but if the court takes the view suggested in the latter definition which I have read, that prima facie is only sufficient to throw the burden upon the other man and to require him to produce evidence, and that when he has produced that evidence the force and effect of the prima facie case is overthrown, you have a doctrine which, if it were held with reference to the legislation we are about to enact, would result in emasculating it. So I have great sympathy for the desire—indeed, I am in perfect accord with the desire—of the Senator from Montana to make these judgments really effective.

How slight a thing a prima facie case may be is well illustrated in a case which I find on momentary examination from my own State—the case of Gilbert against The Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, reported in One hundred and ninety-seventh Missouri. The syllabus of that case reads in part:

> Under the statute giving to the owner damages for stock which go onto a railroad not "inclosed by a good fence" and are injured no liability attaches to the railroad company for failure to put a cattle guard at the place where the stock enters if to do so would endanger the lives or limbs of the company's employees. No such express exception is written in the statute, but to construe it otherwise would make its meaning unnatural.

The third syllabus is the following:

> The owner of a horse which went onto a railroad track and was killed makes out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the railroad by showing that there was no cattle guard at the crossing where the horse entered upon the track, and because of that fact the horse got on the track and was killed. And if his evidence stops there, he has made out a prima facie case, which casts the burden on the railroad company to show that a cattle guard could not have been maintained there without imperiling the lives of railroad employees whose business required them to walk over it. But if, in order to show the condition of the crossing at the particular place, it becomes necessary for plaintiff to show the whole condition, and in doing so he shows a condition which speaks for itself and suggests the question of whether or not a cattle guard could be maintained at the place without endangering the lives of the company's employees whose business in operating trains compelled them to pass over it, the burden was not cast upon defendant; but plaintiff, under such circumstances, is not entitled to ask the jury for a verdict until he has shown by some explanatory evidence that a cattle guard could have been maintained there without imperiling the lives and limbs of the railroad employees.

It will be observed by the few Senators who are giving this bill consideration that in that case the statute which declared that a certain showing was prima facie was reduced so that it simply made the shadow of a showing, which could be blown aside by very slight evidence to the contrary.

I think it would be very wise if we passed by this section this morning, and let us see if we can not determine on some language which will strengthen it in this regard. I am afraid to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, because I fear it might destroy the whole law. I am afraid to vote for it for another reason.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I should like to state that reason. It is that I can see cases where it might do a great injustice. As I observed a little while ago, this judgment would be conclusive, both as to law and as to fact; and it might be that after a judgment was rendered and the law declared in a certain manner, the highest authority in the country might declare that law to be bad law; and yet, for all time that judgment would stand, and any person could invoke it and it would be conclusive upon the party against whom it was rendered, although the Supreme Court of the United States might have otherwise declared the law.

FORT HAYS MILITARY RESERVATION, KANS.

During the delivery of Mr. REED's speech,

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. Out of order, from the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably with an amendment House bill 14155, and I submit a report (No. 748) thereon. As this is entirely a local matter, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. What is the bill referred to, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas reports from the Committee on Public Lands a bill and asks for its immediate consideration. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14155) to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park."

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I wish to suggest the rule of the Senate does not permit a Senator who has the floor to yield for the presentation of morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not understand the remark of the Senator from Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has stated there is no doubt about its being the rule of the Senate that no Senator shall interrupt another Senator who is on the floor for the purpose of introducing a bill or making a report.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understood the Senator from Missouri yielded for the purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But, under the rules of the Senate, the Senator had no right to yield under such circumstances.

Mr. REED. I will yield the floor and take my chances of getting it again in order to let the Senator from Kansas secure consideration of his bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, before the word "Statutes," to insert "volume 31," so as to read:

> That an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (vol. 31, Stat. L., p. 52)—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (vol. 31, Stat. L., p. 52), entitled 'An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park.'"

After the conclusion of Mr. REED's speech,

COTTON WAREHOUSES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, during the period of my presence in the Senate I have not at any time heretofore asked the consideration by the Senate of any subject except that which was immediately before the Senate. To-day the importance of the question, growing as it does out of the European wars, justifies my action. I call your attention to an emergency bill which, later on, I shall ask unanimous consent to take up, and I trust you will pass without a dissenting vote.

The bill to which I refer is Senate bill 6266, reported favorably on yesterday from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is a bill that authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to issue licenses to such cotton warehouses as may apply to him for license, the business of which involves interstate and foreign commerce. The licensed warehouses will then become subject to regulations to be passed by the Secretary of Agriculture. They must submit to classification by him. They must submit to inspection by him. The effect of this supervision will be that warehouse receipts issued for cotton stored in these warehouses will have a recognized standing when offered for sale or when tendered as security for advances of money or when used in payment of obligations.

This is practically the extent to which the bill goes. It does not force any warehouse to submit to the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture or to take out a license. It permits the warehouse to obtain the benefit of the additional standing for its warehouse receipts for cotton which they will derive through inspection and regulation by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. President, I believe the cotton situation to-day in the South is not simply a local problem; it is one of national importance and should be of national interest. In 1800 we exported from the United States only 36,000 bales of cotton; since that time lint cotton, sold abroad, has returned to the United States approximately $20,000,000,000 of gold. Last year lint cotton exported brought back to the United States $610,000,000. It saved our international balance. It furnished the $610,000,000 from foreign countries to give life and strength to our entire commerce.

So enormous an exportation necessarily has a great influence, not simply upon the local business of the section producing the cotton but upon the entire country. A large part of the things required to produce cotton are bought outside of the South. Much of the foodstuffs consumed is bought from the Middle West. The manufactured products used upon the farm are bought from the East. The commerce of the whole country is largely affected by the $1,000,000,000 for which the cotton crop and the cotton seed produced in our Southern States sold last year.

I hold in my hand a statement of the consumption of lint cotton by the mills of foreign countries during 1913, which I desire to place in the RECORD:

	Bales.
Great Britain	3,281,000
Germany	1,256,000
Russia	376,000
France	786,000
Austria	626,000
Italy	537,000
Spain	261,000
Belgium	171,000
Japan	423,000
Switzerland	58,000
Holland	67,000
India	73,000

The present cotton crop is simply a normal crop, about 500,000 bales less than last year's crop. A normal demand for this crop would give it a selling price of about 13 cents a pound; but the foreign war——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, when the Senator says 13 cents a pound, where does he mean?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should say at the mill here in the United States. It sold last week at 13½ cents in England.

Mr. LIPPITT. I only asked the question, because it makes quite a difference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think probably 13½ cents at the mill would be a normal price. It would depend somewhat, of course, upon where the mill was. Thirteen cents would be about a normal price at the mills in Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina. That would be about midway of the United States.

It is estimated that it cost to produce the crop of the present year between 11 and 11½ cents a pound. Sixty per cent of the demand for the crop at present is suspended.

It is a fair estimate to say that one-half the value of the crop is owed for its production, and this indebtedness reaches not alone to the local bank and the local merchant; it reaches on to the northern wholesale merchant and the northern bank. In addition to the great value to the commerce of the entire country which this crop brings through exportation there is its effect locally upon the business of the entire country.

I desire to call attention to the fact that next year's crop must necessarily be lessened. The same war which interferes with the demand for the raw material cuts off the supply of potash and other ingredients absolutely essential for commercial fertilizers, for they are largely bought from Germany. So that the fertilizer supply for next year must necessarily be substantially reduced. Indeed, many of the mills now are almost unable to produce fertilizer, being unable to obtain their supplies of potash. The fact that a large amount of cotton must necessarily be carried over, and carried over by the farmers themselves, together with the fact that foodstuffs are high, already has turned the farmers in the cotton-growing States into preparation for large quantities of oats, and, in those portions of the section that will raise it, to wheat. It can be confidently asserted that this year's cotton supply and next year's cotton supply will be consumed by the mills of next year and the year following; that the temporary loss in mill consumption by reason of the war will be more than met by the reduced production of cotton next year.

I believe it is also a just conclusion that the three raw materials which compete with cotton will be produced next year in lessened quantity and be more expensive by reason of the war. I refer to wool, flax, and silk. Already in Germany and in Europe the sheep supply is being lessened as a result of the war through consumption for food. While the finer fabrics made from cotton will find a lessened consumption, the coarser fabrics will have an increased consumption, and the coarser fabrics require the largest amount of lint cotton. So I believe it to be a just conclusion that the production of lint cotton this year and next year will be fully demanded by the consumption of the two years that are to come.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator why this Government inspection and this process as to warehouse receipts in cotton, if it is to be adopted, should not be extended to other staple agricultural products?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not objecting to its extension. I only undertook to present a measure in which the people whom I represent are directly interested. I have already suggested to Senators who are interested on other lines that they consider the question with reference to their peculiar localities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, from which this bill came, considered the system with relation to other great staple products?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. This bill really is the product of the Agricultural Department, of Congressman LEVER, of South Carolina, and of myself; but we have considered the possibility of such an amendment, and there is no disposition to resist such an amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I supposed, without being at all familiar with it—I have glanced over the bill hastily since the Senator began to speak—that the idea is to make the warehouse certificate a more reliable instrument, a negotiable instrument, practically, and to inspire confidence in it, owing to the fact that the department has examined the goods that are stored and certifies as to the quantity and quality.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I made substantially that statement at the opening of my remarks. What I wish to do at this time is to press the proposition that the cotton now in the South, though half its market is temporarily cut off, within the next two years will be demanded for manufacture, and that it is simply a question of carrying over part of this cotton for 12 months; that the world's demand will press for it within that time; that the supply of its rivals—wool, flax, and silk—will be lessened; that the lessened use of finer fabrics will be made up by increased use of coarser fabrics, and the coarser fabrics made from cotton require more of the raw material, though much less valuable when finally manufactured; and that cotton properly warehoused, properly cared for, absolutely durable, as good when 50 years old as when a month old, furnishes the most perfect basis for warehouse deposit and warehouse certificate; and that at any sum approximately the cost of production, which for the present crop was something over 11 cents a pound, it should give to the investor a handsome profit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, what I want to find out, being ignorant, as compared with the Senator from Georgia, of the method in which the cotton crop is carried and marketed, is this: Supposing that it is desirable to carry along a large proportion of the cotton crop for a year or two. Why can not that be done now if parties are willing to furnish the capital? What is the difficulty about their sending their own agents or inspectors to examine the cotton and then warehousing it themselves?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not any difficulty about their doing it, but there is a great additional value which would be given to a uniform system and a uniform classification. The public generally will accept a warehousing system supervised and classified and graded by Government officials as a far better security than when conducted on an individual and unsystematized plan.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had supposed that in practical operation a large amount of cotton would require a large amount of capital to carry it; that something in the nature of a syndicate would be formed by bankers or people who have capital to invest; and that they would buy up a large quantity of it under their own inspection and store it themselves. Is it the idea, if this bill should pass, that a warehouse certificate shall be issued against the individual deposit of cotton by planters and that they would themselves find a market in a smaller pro rata way?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I get the Senator's idea.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A farmer with 25 bales or 50 bales of cotton upon which he perhaps needs to obtain $25 a bale to go through the season, with his certificate of deposit from a warehouse of the character proposed, would have an available security if he desired to sell a part of it. If he desired to sell 5 or 10 bales, a purchaser might well buy on the basis of 11 cents per pound, earn 10 per cent interest, probably 25 per cent interest, on his investment during the next 12 months. We wish to broaden the field for handling the crop, to aid the actual producer, to free him from the necessity to a large extent of selling to the speculator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it the Senator's idea that these warehouse certificates would be dealt in upon exchanges like the certificates of stock to be bought or sold, or would they simply be deposited as a collateral for loans?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They can be dealt in generally. Many people locally would buy them. It would facilitate the utilization of all money that was available, whether in large quantities or in small quantities.

I trust that within a few months the ocean may be open for transportation, and that a large part of our foreign consumption will be resumed, and that the real volume of the crop which must be carried over to a second season will not be more than 25 per cent. But whatever it is, I present the thought that it is not simply a matter of local interest. Of course, it is primarily of local interest; it is of the utmost local importance; but it is also true that a commodity which brought $610,000,000 of gold last year to the United States from its exportation contributes greatly to the entire commerce of our whole country. I am justified in asking the attention of all Senators to this problem as one of national importance.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. LIPPPITT. I just wanted to ask the Senator whether he had an idea that the passage of this act, whatever its ultimate benefits might be, would possibly have any particular effect upon the storage of cotton during the present season?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. Are there now in existence in the South a large number of storehouses——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Quite a number.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will permit me to continue, are there now in the South in existence a large number of storehouses which would be available for the storage of cotton under such a provision as this——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. Which would not be unless such a provision is enacted? In other words, while the Senator is arguing this matter from the standpoint of the immediate situation, it seems to me the bill would have no effect upon the immediate situation unless as a result of it there was either built in the South a number of buildings for storehouses, or there was in consequence of it devoted to the use of storage a number of buildings that are not now available for that purpose, in addition to what already exist. Of course, to build a cotton storehouse is not a matter of an overnight's operation. It takes some considerable time.

I should like to say to the Senator that I am not in any way antagonistic to anything that will enable the southern people in this situation or in any situation to get a good price for their cotton crop. I sympathize very strongly with them in the situation which they are now facing. It looks as though, among all the agricultural people in the country, their particular product, under these unfortunate circumstances, is one that is apt to suffer the most. I agree with the Senator in his theory that there is no crop in this country that is of so great value to all the people of the country in regard to its foreign relations as the cotton crop. The export of that crop annually brings us very large sums of money. Two-thirds of it is exported, in round numbers, and one-third of it is used at home.

I have always been a great believer in the South getting a good price for its cotton, and I will be very glad to join the Senator in any reasonable provision that will enable the people of the South to get a good price for their cotton. Although I come from a section of the country which purchases cotton, and although I am myself a user of cotton, I have always felt that the benefit to the country of the South getting a high price for its cotton was of much greater importance than any temporary benefit which would come to New England from buying cotton at a low price. The manufacturer must have rich customers to get a good price for his product. The money which the other nations of the world bring to this country for the amount of cotton which is used foreign, if sold to them at a high price in its buying capacity is of the greatest importance, and it really to a user of cotton makes no difference in the long run what price he pays for it. It is only a question of his paying the same price that other people are paying for it.

I merely wish to say that I am not at all antagonistic in any way to any purpose the Senator may have toward getting a higher price for cotton, but it did seem to me that he was arguing this proposition from the standpoint of the immediate emergency. He is more familiar with it than I am, but I really am not able to see at the moment how we can apply it to the immediate emergency at all.

Of course we in New England would gladly welcome—the users of cotton all over the world would gladly welcome—some new method of storing the cotton in the South. As it is now done it is largely left out in the open. You may go through the South in the train and see the cotton by the side of the plantation cabin exposed to weather of all kinds, and being injured in various ways, lying in the mud; and being a very valuable crop, it is an anomalous situation. Some provision ought to be made for the better protection of the cotton. If this would do it in a reasonable way, and do it effectively, and will not be too great a cost to the Government, I should be inclined to help the Senator in getting it, but I should like to have a standard.

I beg the Senator's pardon for speaking so long.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am glad the Senator from Rhode Island interrupted me. His statement with reference to the attitude of the manufacturers of New England is just what I understand it to be. I do not believe there is any desire on the part of the manufacturers in the United States to depress the price of cotton. All they ask is that their competitors do not buy cheaper than they buy. They can not afford to pay one price and have competitors buy at substantially lower prices.

Mr. LIPPITT. I might say in all fairness to the Senator that in trying out that situation the practical effect of it is that they are almost always trying to buy a little lower. If they are assured that everyone else is paying the same price it is a matter of indifference to them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is uniformity of price that is essential. With reference to how this measure can help us at once, I wish to say to the Senator that it is practicable in a very short time, at a very small expense, to put up a warehouse that is entirely serviceable. Space upon the ground is cheap, and a felt covering is ample at a small expense. I do not think I have the correct name, but it is a felt roofing. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] tells me it is called felt roofing. It is a cheap roofing that is used to cover the warehouse, and at a very little expense quite a large warehouse can be made.

Mr. LIPPITT. Does the Senator contemplate fireproof warehouses or simply buildings for protection from the weather?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are for protection from the weather, and properly guarded they are easily protected from fire. There are a great many buildings which are rapidly being gathered together in localities throughout the South at the present time which are available for cotton warehouse purposes. They are unoccupied, and they are being obtained by local committees and put in shape for cotton storage. While the storehouses will not be, perhaps, ideal, yet warehousing facilities are rapidly being put in shape with a view of caring for a large part of the crop.

The object of inspection and classification by the Secretary of Agriculture is that the certificates may fall under classes that the buyer will comprehend.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not want to discourage the Senator, but it does not seem to me that the Secretary of Agriculture would be likely to approve or to certify such a storehouse as the Senator described. Of course if he is going to give his approval to a storehouse, it must be a building that is efficient from all the aspects of the case. I do not suppose this bill, which I have just read and which the Senator has given reasons for, means that any flimsy structure or any temporary structure——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If so, it would be shown to be that character of structure. The bill provides for different classes of certificates. The warehouse receipt discloses the classification.

Mr. LIPPITT. Why is it not feasible for the respective States in the South to issue their own certificates for this purpose, instead of having the National Government undertake to comply with a purely local need? The State, acting through its legislature, in authorizing such structures, the certificate would be quite as strong.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so.

Mr. LIPPITT. The only purpose, I understand, the Senator has in mind immediately is to enable people to borrow money.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or to sell certificates, to make negotiable paper.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, to get cash in some form or other for their cotton. I should think on simply the one proposition it would be a cheap way for the respective States, and it would be a quick way, to meet the emergency.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We believe it would be vastly better if it were under the Department of Agriculture. The department is prepared to take hold of the subject at once. The department has its Division of Markets in operation, and the Secretary and the director of the division feel competent to handle it and handle it rapidly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, why does the Senator include in his bill a provision for wicked national inspection and grading, which has been so heartily condemned on that side and by a few Members on this side, when, as a matter of fact, there is an efficient system of grading in New Orleans, Galveston, Charleston, Boston, and New York? Can not the Senator see that he is destroying those systems of inspection and grading, which have been the result of the legislation of those States for the last 40 years, by a system of national inspection and grading which received such hearty condemnation on the part of the Senate when it was asked in relation to wheat and oats and barley?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's eloquent speeches on the subject of wheat and oats and barley were very persuasive with me. He did not hear any speeches made from my desk criticizing the line of thought that he presented.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the junior Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So the inquiry of the Senator should be addressed to some one else.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator just one other question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator would have no objection whatever if we would amend the bill so as to add another section at the end which would read about as follows:

That all the provisions of this act shall apply, as far as practicable, to warehouses for the inspection of wheat, oats, barley, corn, and rye, and the further sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated to pay salaries and expenses relative to grain warehouses and for the inspection of said grains.

That would cover the matter of grain, in which we are interested the same as cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I see no reason to object.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator, if I may be allowed, if he would not make a good job of it and add to it "cotton, woolen, and silk goods, or merchandise of any other kind, in similar storehouses"?

Mr. WEST. I would suggest, as a southern product, naval stores.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator from Rhode Island what difference there is in principle between the warehousing of the cotton which is produced by the farmer and warehousing and the easy selling of grains that are produced by the farmer? The Senator from Rhode Island indicated his most hearty approval of this provision in relation to cotton. Why should it not apply with the same force to the proper and easy handling of grains and the disposition of certificates?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator that I see no reason why it should not apply; but I am not familiar enough with the details of the grain business to answer the question. However, I should like to say, further, that when I was discussing it I had only very hastily read the bill, and I was considering merely the principle of having cotton stored in a Government bonded warehouse and licensed. So far as the National Government entering into the question of the grading of cotton, itself becoming responsible for the grade of cotton on which those certificates might be issued, that is contained in the bill, I think it is an entirely different question from the one which I was talking about with the Senator from Georgia. I think personally it is not a wise provision that the National Government should enter into that field and make itself responsible for that gradation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am very sorry if I have brought——

Mr. WEST. With the consent of the Senator from Georgia I should like to ask a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I beg the Chair's pardon. I really thought I had the floor. But I should like to say to the Senator from Rhode Island——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator had the floor with the consent of the Senator from Georgia. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Rhode Island has made a suggestion, and I regret that I called his attention to anything which would make him feel like opposing this bill. But I want to say to the Senator there has already been passed through the Senate a measure providing for the inspection and grading of cotton. It provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation to him of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to grade or classify cotton and to certify the grade or class thereof under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to the act. So that section opens up the matter clearly of national grading and certifying, and I agree entirely with the Senator from Georgia that that certification by the Government, as a standard to fix values and to give confidence to the purchaser of the certificates, is the very life of this bill and the very best thing there is in it.

Mr. LIPPITT. If I may answer that question——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. With the permission of the Senator just let me answer the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield first to the Senator from Rhode Island, and then I will yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. LIPPITT. I may not be fully informed, but I am in doubt if the Senator from North Dakota is correct when he says the Government has been authorized to classify and inspect cotton in regard to its grading.

Mr. McCUMBER. It passed the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. I understand the act passed the Senate to enable the Government to establish standard grades.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was all.

Mr. LIPPITT. But to see whether it shall conform to those grades is quite another question. For the Government to establish the grade to indicate what class of cotton should be called middling, or good middling, and so forth, is quite a different matter from saying that the particular bale of cotton is good middling. I think the Senator will see the distinction there. It is a very strong one.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia said he would have no objection to the provision suggested by the Senator from North Dakota. I wonder whether he would have any objection to a similar provision in reference to warehouses where apples and salmon and shingles and lumber are stored.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would wish to see the provision before it was agreed to. That, of course, would be utterly impracticable, because they are not staple products.

Mr. JONES. They are staple in our part of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are not staple in the sense that they are permanent in their value. Really cotton occupies a position entirely different from any other agricultural product in this respect. Time does not affect its value. When it is 10 years old it is just as valuable as when it is a month old.

I present the bill. A little later on I shall seek an opportunity to take it up for consideration. I do not ask the Senate to take it up to-day.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

I think I see the purpose of the bill. I suppose the purpose of the bill is to provide an opportunity for the cotton raisers of the South to store their cotton and to borrow money on it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is largely it. It is to facilitate their doing so to meet the great emergency that is upon us.

Mr. NELSON. I would suggest one thing to the Senator in that connection. This is precisely what we are doing with our wheat in the Northwest. It is shipped to the terminal elevators. They issue warehouse receipts specifying the grade and the weight and that it is in store; but under our law we have a provision requiring those terminal warehouses to insure the grain. What I was going to suggest to the Senator in connection with this bill, and I think it would improve it and strengthen it immensely, is to provide that the cotton stored in these bonded warehouses shall be insured for the benefit of the holders of the receipts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a provision looking toward insurance.

Mr. NELSON. But it ought to be made compulsory. The wheat receipts from our terminal elevators are considered in the Northwest to be the very best bank paper. Anyone can borrow money on a terminal warehouse receipt from one of the warehouses when he could not borrow on almost any other floating security. I think if your object is to make these warehouse receipts current and to enable your people to borrow money on them, you ought to make them as strong and effective as possible, and you should do that by providing for compulsory insurance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall not detain the Senate longer at the present time. I wished to bring this subject to the attention of the Senate that Senators might consider it. At the first convenient opportunity I will seek to bring it before the Senate for action.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield the floor entirely.

Mr. GRONNA. I was just going to ask the Senator a question.

Does not the bill really have the effect of bringing the producer and the manufacturer closer together? Could not all the warehouse receipts be bought by the manufacturers, and in that way the middlemen be eliminated?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. It is true, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has stated, that in our part of the country we can use these warehouse receipts and the grain is insured. But that is really a little different proposition. The terminal elevators have the privilege of using the grain if they wish. Under the bill of the Senator from Georgia the cotton could not be used.

My colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] has really brought out the question I intended to ask the Senator from Georgia. But I should want to amend the bill in a different form from the amendment proposed by my colleague. I ask the Senator from Georgia if there would be objection to an amendment to insert, wherever the word "cotton" is found, the words "and grain," and to make such other amendments as may be necessary in order to make the language complete.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he put his amendment in shape. One reason why I brought up the subject to-day was to bring it to the attention of Senators who were interested, that they might prepare any amendments they wish to prepare before the time when, a day or two later, I shall call up the bill and ask action upon it.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator knows that I am friendly to the legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator knows, I shall not oppose this legislation, but I should like to have it apply to grain. While I do not think the Senator's bill, as proposed to be amended, will do what would be accomplished under the bill that my colleague had before the Senate for many years, it would be good work in the right direction.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and also to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], that a bill covering this entire subject with reference to grain is now in course of preparation and will be introduced within a day or two; in fact, I had hoped to introduce it yesterday, but the measure is not yet completed.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question. Is not the bill to which the Senator from Oklahoma has reference a bill for the standardization of grain?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator is in error upon that point. The bill to which I refer covers the whole subject reported in the bill introduced by the Senator from Georgia in relation to cotton; it is a companion measure to that, including the warehouse proposition, the issuance of certificates, and so on, and also the question of wheat and other grain. There are, however, a great many details in which the two measures must differ. For that reason there has been some delay in the preparation of the bill in relation to grain. I hope, however, to be able to introduce it, if not to-day, at least within the next two or three days.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that I do not want him to infer from the question I asked that I am opposed to his bill; I am with him on any proposition designed to cover the ground and to help out in the present emergency which will appeal to my judgment and which I think is a proper measure; but it did occur to me that possibly the bill might be made to take care of a similar situation in our State. I know that if I can frame a proposal which will appeal to the Senator he will not object to it. Of course, I recognize that the condition with reference to cotton is very different from the condition with reference to the products I have in mind.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OWEN. Let the amendment be stated before the question is put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST voted in the negative.

Mr. OWEN. Before the Chair ordered the roll called, I had requested that the amendment might be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is to strike out section 6 of the House bill and to insert the provision reported by the Senate committee as amended. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if I may be permitted——

Mr. OWEN. I do not know what that amendment is, and I want it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is now too late. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the roll call has been begun.

Mr. OWEN. But the request was made——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment may be stated by unanimous consent. That is the only way it can be done.

Mr. OWEN. The request was made of the Chair before the roll call was begun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Secretary will restate the amendment. The Chair hears none.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 12, after the words "Sec. 6," it is proposed to strike out:

That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States under any of the antitrust laws there shall have been rendered a final judgment or decree to the effect that a defendant has entered into a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce, or has monopolized or attempted to monopolize or combined with any person or persons to monopolize, any part of commerce, in violation of any of the antitrust laws, said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity is hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States, under any of the antitrust laws, the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under such antitrust laws and based, in whole or in part, on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding in equity shall be suspended during the pendency of such suit or proceeding in equity.

And to insert:

That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Any person may be prosecuted, tried, or punished for any offense under the antitrust laws, and any suit arising under those laws may be maintained if the indictment is found or the suit is brought within six years next after the occurrence of the act or cause of action complained of, any statute of limitation or other provision of law heretofore enacted to the contrary notwithstanding. Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity is instituted by the United States to prevent or restrain violations of any of the antitrust laws the running of the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action arising under said laws and based in whole or in part on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding shall be suspended during the pendency thereof: Provided, That this shall not be held to extend the statute of limitations in the case of offenses heretofore committed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He is absent from the Chamber, and I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with that Senator, but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the vote is directly upon the amendment of the committee to section 6 of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was so informed a moment ago; but I thought the Senator was in the Chamber, and I voted. I transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and will let the announcement stand for the day. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. GALLINGER. I am requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]; of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bankhead	Gallinger	Nelson	Smoot
Borah	Hitchcock	Newlands	Sterling
Bryan	Hughes	Overman	Swanson
Burton	Kenyon	Perkins	Thornton
Camden	Lane	Pomerene	Weeks
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	West
Culberson	Lippitt	Shafroth	White
Cummins	McCumber	Simmons	Williams
Fall	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.

NAYS—16.

Ashurst	James	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard
Bristow	Jones	Norris	Shively
Clapp	Kern	Pittman	Thompson
Gronna	Lewis	Poindexter	Walsh

NOT VOTING—45.

Brady	Goff	Page	Stephenson
Brandegee	Gore	Penrose	Stone
Burleigh	Hollis	Reed	Sutherland
Catron	Johnson	Robinson	Thomas
Chamberlain	La Follette	Root	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Townsend

Crawford	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Dillingham	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
du Pont	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Fletcher	Owen	Smith, S. C.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to speak this afternoon on the subject of the labor provisions contained in this bill. Since I have been in the Senate it has been my pleasure to aid in the establishment of a Department of Labor, the establishment of a Children's Bureau, to vote for the eight-hour law in the District of Columbia, to support the workmen's compensation bill, and to support a great may other measures which I conceived would aid in relieving the burdens of labor and redound to the general welfare. There are many provisions in this bill on this subject which have my hearty concurrence. I am unqualifiedly in favor of requiring notice to be given before an injunction or restraining order is issued whenever it is possible to give notice and subserve the ends of justice.

I am heartily in favor of jury trials in cases of indirect contempt. In this country we believe in jury trials. There is very little sentiment opposing jury trials in any issue of fact in a law case or in criminal cases, and if we believe in jury trials where the rights of litigants are at stake, it seems to me that there can be no good reason assigned why we should not have a jury trial in the case of indirect contempt.

When a court issues its order it is, so to speak, the statute in that particular case until it is modified or set aside. If the delinquent is found guilty, he is punishable in the discretion of the court either by fine or by imprisonment or by both. The contempt charged may have been committed miles away from the presence of the court; the court can have no knowledge upon the subject save such as the information contains and such as the testimony produced before it affords; and in these cases we know, as a matter of fact, that often there is the most intense feeling prevailing on both sides of the case, and, I regret to say, that it sometimes extends even to the court whose order it is alleged has been trampled under foot. That being the situation, it seems to me that we are only furthering a general principle which we have recognized time out of mind when we say that in those cases a trial by jury shall be granted to the delinquent.

There are other features, however, in the pending bill which give to me serious trouble. I refer particularly to sections 7 and 18.

I am a friend of the Sherman law. For a long time it was a dead letter upon the statute books; new life has been breathed into it; and I would regret to see any exemption made as to any of its provisions for any class of citizens, high or low, rich or poor. I take this position because I believe, first, that it would be inimical to the public welfare, and, secondly, I think I shall be able to demonstrate before I shall take my seat that it would be hostile to the interests of the laboring classes themselves.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that the Sherman law has been severely criticized. It has been criticized by all classes, whether they be of the employer class or the employee class, when they come in contact with its provisions. I know that the friends of the pending measure are prone to say that there is no such thing as a trust in labor; that in that respect it is differentiated from capital; and I concede that to be so; but I do not think that an examination of the Sherman law justifies the contention that is made by the friends of the pending bill to the effect that it has ever been claimed that labor is a trust.

The present Sherman law is not in the same form as when it was first introduced in the Senate by Senator Sherman. I want to place emphasis upon that fact.

My very good friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] the other day quoted at length from speeches made on the floor of the Senate by Senator Sherman, Senator Teller, Senator Stewart, and perhaps one or two others, to the effect that it was not intended to cover labor or its derelictions, if any, by the provisions of the bill. There was such a contention as that in the earlier discussion of the bill and before it was finally passed.

The bill was introduced on December 4, 1889. It was referred to the committee, reported to the Senate with amendments, and the discussion, in which it was said that it was not intended to cover labor organizations or their operations, took place before the bill assumed final form. Such was the view expressed on March 24 by Senator Teller, on March 25 by Senator Stewart, and on March 27 by Senator Hoar. On the other hand, Senator Edmunds, on March 27, 1890, as will be seen by referring to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that session, page 2729, spoke in part as follows:

> On the one side you say that it is a crime and on the other side you say it is a valuable and proper undertaking. That will not do, Mr. President. You can not get on in that way. It is impossible to separate them, and the principle of it therefore is that if one side, no matter which it is, is authorized to combine the other side must be authorized to combine or the thing will break and there will be universal bankruptcy. That is what it will come to, and then the laborer, whose interest and welfare we are all so really desirous to promote, will turn around and justly say to the Senate of the United States, "Why did you go to such legislation as that? Why did you attempt to stimulate and almost require us to combine against our employers, and thus break down the whole industry of the country and leave us all beggars? When you allowed us to combine and to regulate our wages why did you not allow the products that our hands produced to be raised in price by an arrangement, so that everybody that bought them might pay the increased price and everybody that was making them all around for whom we were working could live also?" I do not think, as a practical thing, Mr. President, that anybody will thank us for making a distinction of that kind.

If those on one side of a proposition are to be compelled to respond to a criminal statute, it is difficult to conceive why those who are on the other side of that question should not also be required to respond to its criminal or civil provisions, as the case may be.

I refer to the earlier discussion of the Sherman law for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill which was under consideration at the time these expressions were made by Senators Hoar, Teller, and Stewart was not the bill as it passed the Senate. During the discussion and after the question was raised as to whether or not the provisions of the bill as it was originally introduced or as it was thereafter modified by the committee were broad enough to embrace labor and agricultural organizations, Senator Sherman submitted an amendment in the following words:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with the view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages, nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

The same amendment was later offered by the then Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich.

On March 27, 1890, the bill was recommitted to the Judiciary Committee, and on April 2 it was reported out, completely changed in its form and its provisions. The exemption clause which had been engrafted upon it by a committee amendment before its recommittal was entirely eliminated from the bill. After that—and I think I speak advisedly from a considerable examination which I have given the record myself, as well as by valuable assistants in my office—no reference was made to the question of the application or nonapplication of the provisions of the Sherman law to labor or agricultural organizations. So much it seems to me should be said in the interest of the history of that legislation. The fact that such exemptions were placed in the bill and later taken out by the committee, and its action afterwards confirmed by the Senate, clearly indicates an intention on the part of the Congress to make no exemptions.

Now, I desire to call attention particularly to the provisions of the Sherman law as it passed on July 2, 1890. The title of the bill had been changed. The title of the bill as introduced by Senator Sherman was:

A bill to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production.

I offer, without reading it, the first section of that bill, and ask that it be incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The section referred to is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with the intention to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation, or sale of articles imported into the United States, or in the production, manufacture, or sale of articles of domestic growth or production, or domestic raw material, that competes with any similar article upon which a duty is levied by the United States, intended for and which shall be transported from one State or Territory to another for sale, and all such arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations, intended to advance the cost to the consumer of any such articles, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the title was amended so that it now reads:

An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies.

It is not a law against organizations per se, whether they be of labor, or of capital, or what not. It was recognized in the early history of that law that most of the restraints of trade were occasioned by unlawful combinations of capital and monopolies, but it was also likewise recognized that a restraint of trade was in itself inimical to the public good no matter what its origin. The first section of the law, in part, reads as follows:

Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal.

So we see that the ultimate object of this law was not to prevent combinations of any kind, but its primary purpose was to prevent restraints of trade. Conceding for the moment that a restraint of trade ought to be prohibited, it seems to me that it makes but very little difference whether that restraint of trade is made by one class of citizens or by another class. The effect, so far as the public is concerned, is one and the same.

Mr. President, if there ever was any question as to the construction which is to be placed upon this act, it was ended for all time when the Supreme Court, in the Standard Oil Co. case and in the American Tobacco Co. case, said that the words "restraint of trade" meant only an undue restraint of trade. Conceding that to be the proper construction to be placed upon this act, can anyone say for one minute that a combination or organization of laborers for the purpose of obtaining a reasonable wage, or for the purpose of shortening hours, or for the purpose of obtaining reasonably good labor conditions is an undue restraint of trade? The proposition only needs to be stated to fail.

I submit this statement again: If a restraint of trade is a thing that ought to be guarded against by the laws of the United States, it can make no difference, so far as the public welfare is concerned, whether that restraint of trade is due to one class or to another class; the result is the same.

I recognize the fact that there is considerable sentiment in this country among our laboring friends asking for this exemption. I do not believe they would ask it if they understood what the law in fact is.

It is charged that it has been resorted to too frequently; that labor has been made to suffer unduly. The law was passed July 2, 1890, twenty-four years ago. Since that time the Department of Justice has begun 166 cases, and I have on my desk here two letters from the Assistant Attorney General showing that in the 24 years only 13 of these cases have been brought by the department against labor organizations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to recall to the Senator from Ohio a statement made by him a moment ago concerning which I wish to ask a question and upon which my own mind is not at all clear.

The Senator from Ohio said that it has never been claimed that a labor organization the purpose of which is to secure reasonable wages for its members is a combination in restraint of trade. I should like to know whether the Senator from Ohio attaches any significance to the use of the word "reasonable"? Suppose a combination of workingmen were to come together to secure what some people would call unreasonable wages; would such a combination be in violation of the antitrust law? If so, who is to determine whether the demand of the organization is reasonable or unreasonable?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I used the word "reasonable" at the time, I think, without attaching any considerable importance to it. My belief is, under the law, that when it comes to contests for an increase of wages, for betterment of hours, for betterment of conditions, so long as it is by peaceful means, this law would not apply, no matter whether the demands are reasonable or not; and I wish in a little while to take up this proposition and discuss it from a legal standpoint. In order that I may do this in the logical order, I desire to call attention to a statement of the law as it is believed to be by the American Federation of Labor.

I read from the report of the Judiciary Committee, on page 10—there is a little more to it in the report of the testimony, but I shall content myself with reading from the report of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, before the Senator starts, may I ask whether that is the report of 1890?

Mr. POMERENE. No; it is contained in the report of 1914 submitted on this bill by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Gompers, in discussing the subject, said:

Gentlemen, under the interpretation placed upon the Sherman antitrust law by the courts, it is within the province and within the power of any administration at any time to begin proceedings to dissolve any organization of labor in the United States and to take charge of and receive whatever funds any worker or organization may have wanted to contribute or felt that it is his duty to contribute to the organization.

Mr. WEBB. Are there any suits pending in the courts now looking to this end, Mr. Gompers?

Mr. GOMPERS. There are no suits now pending, but an organization of workingmen, the window-glass workers, was dissolved by order of the court under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, charged with conspiracy as an illegal combination in restraint of trade. And while that organization was dissolved by action of the court, yet it created no furor, for this reason: I have no desire to reflect upon the men who are in charge of that organization as its officers and representatives, but it was, in my judgment, supine cowardice for them not to resist an attempt of the dissolution of their associated effort as a voluntary organization of men to protect the only thing they possessed—the power to labor.

It will be noted that there are not enough of the accompanying facts to advise us as to what the conspiracy was or the nature of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I will ask the Senator to pardon me until I shall have finished this:

Mr. WEBB. Have you any case where a labor organization has been dissolved simply because they themselves united in asking or fixing a certain wage and went no further in uniting with the manufacturers?

Mr. GOMPERS. I can not tell you, sir, about that. But that is the very essence of the life of the organization. What I want to convey is this, that there are probably, of these 30,000 or more local associations of workingmen, what we call local unions of workingmen and workingwomen, probably more than two-thirds of whom have agreements with employers. As a matter of fact, I think that every observer and every humanitarian who knows greeted with the greatest satisfaction the creation of the protocol in the sweated industries of New York City and vicinity which abolished sweat shops and long hours of labor, and the burdensome, miserable toil prevailing, and established the combination of employers and of workmen and workwomen by which certain standards are to be enforced, and no employer can become a member of the manufacturers' association in that trade unless he is willing to undersign an agreement by which the conditions prevailing in the protocol will be inaugurated by him. Yet, under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, that association of manufacturers has been sued, I think, for something like $250,000, because it is a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

What I mean to say is this: I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that the Attorney General of this administration, the Attorney General of the United States under the present administration, is not going to dissolve or make any attempt to dissolve the organizations of the working people of this country. I firmly believe that if there should be any of them, any individual or an aggregation of individuals, guilty of any crime, that the present administration would proceed against them just as readily, and perhaps more so, as any other; I am speaking of the procedure against the organizations themselves and the dissolution of them.

But who can tell whether this administration is going to continue very long, or whether the same policy is going to be pursued; that is, the policy of permitting these associations to exist without interference or attempts to isolate them? Who can tell what may come, what may not the future hold in store for us working people who are engaged in an effort for the protection of men and women who toil to make life better worth living? We do not want to exist as a matter of sufferance, subject to the whims or to the chances or to the vindictiveness of any administration or of any administration officer. Our existence is justified not only by our history, but our existence is legally the best concept of what constitutes law. It is an outrage; it is an outrage of not only the conscience, it is an outrage upon justice, it is an outrage upon our language, to attempt to place in the same category a combination of men engaged in the speculation and the control of the products of labor and the products of the soil on the one hand and the associations of men and women who own nothing but themselves and undertake to control nothing but themselves and their power to work.

Mr FLOYD. I want to see if I understand your position. If I understand your position under the existing status of the law as determined by the Federal courts, if the Attorney General should proceed to dissolve any of your labor organizations they could be dissolved. Is that your proposition.

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. And that your existence, therefore, depends upon the sufferance of the administration which happens to be in power for the time being?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. What you desire is for us to give you a legal status under the law?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. So you can carry on this cooperative work on behalf of the laborers of the country and of the different organizations without being under the ban of the existing law?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, if that were the law as stated, I would vote for its repeal; but I submit that no respectable court has ever so held. All organizations are legal unless there is something in the law which makes them illegal. Labor organizations have been recognized time out of mind, and I hope they always will be. If I were a laboring man, I would be an organization man; and if I were an employer of labor, I would encourage my men to be organization men, because I believe labor organizations have been an instrumentality of very great good in this country.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the case to which Mr. Gompers referred in his testimony there, the Glassworkers' case, in which it is said that the organization was proceeded against under the Sherman law, it was a case arising in the Senator's State. I was going to ask the Senator if it is his purpose to discuss that case, or if he is familiar with the facts?

Mr. POMERENE. I am not familiar with the facts in the case.

Mr. BORAH. I have made some investigation in regard to it, and my investigation leads me to the conclusion—it was a case of a nisi prius court—that it was not a proceeding under the Sherman law at all, but under the common law and the statutes of the State of Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his statement.

Mr. BORAH. I shall not take up the time of the Senator now in discussing it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he has examined the case in West Virginia, the opinion in which was delivered by Judge Dayton a year or two ago, in which it was held under the Sherman law that labor organizations were illegal?

Mr. POMERENE. I have not. But does the Senator say that that was so held without any other accompanying facts?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have sent for the book. I make the general statement that labor organizations were held to be illegal by Judge Dayton.

Mr. POMERENE. If that be true, then——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a minute. If that be true, it has not been recognized as a precedent; and if it be true, the judge made a mistake—just such a mistake as he could make or any other judge that was not well informed as to the law.

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. HOLLIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey, but I——

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to ask the Senator if he is familiar with the various decisions that were handed down in the Danbury Hat case?

Mr. POMERENE. I am.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator, then, doubtless will remember that in one of the courts—I forget whether it was the Supreme Court or the other court—the opinion held that the Sherman antitrust law acted in the Federal jurisdiction as the common law acted in the various States, and that it was even broader than the common law so far as restraints and monopolies were concerned. If that be so, of course the Senator is familiar with the fact that in the absence of a statute and under the common law of England any three or more men who simultaneously withdraw from an employer's employment are guilty of a conspiracy.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I am not going to take time to discuss the common law of England, except to say that the hostile and vicious decisions which are rendered by the English courts—and I speak generally now; there may be exceptions—were under statutes passed by Parliament and not under the common law; and whatever may have been the common law or statute law in England upon that subject, the rule has never obtained in the United States that an organization of laboring men did not have the right to organize and strike for higher wages or for shorter hours or for better conditions.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I know the Senator does not wish to make a misstatement.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly not.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to call his attention to a case which arose in my own State. It was brought home to me with peculiar force by reason of the fact that the craft which was affected was a craft of which my own father was a member. He was at that time an iron molder in the city of Paterson. The strike occurred in a molding shop, and 14 or 15 iron molders simultaneously withdrew from that employment. They were indicted as common-law conspirators and were sent to the penitentiary. The Legislature of the State of New Jersey at its next meeting passed an act which is in substance the act which is before us now, providing that these men could do these very things, and that they would not be conspirators under the common law.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I limited my statement to the general proposition. If there has been a case here and there in which the law has been too severe in its provisions or administration, we can not correct that by this kind of legislation. The matter to which the Senator has referred was a local matter, under a local statute, or under the local common law.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator; and after that I feel that I ought to be permitted to go on without interruption.

Mr. NELSON. I dislike to interrupt the Senator; but I simply rose for the purpose of calling his attention to the fact that, under the practice and procedure of the United States Government, we have no common-law offenses.

Mr. POMERENE. Very true.

Mr. NELSON. All criminal offenses against the United States are statutory offenses; and the cases to which the Senator from New Jersey has referred were cases arising under the local law in that State. I may further add that, I think, in most of the States they have few if any common-law offenses; they are nearly all statutory offenses of the State.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator has correctly stated the proposition.

Now, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to proceed with my argument without any further interruption, I shall appreciate it. It is very warm, and I feel that my strength will not permit me to continue for the entire afternoon.

I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to the law as I conceive it to be in the United States; and I wish to read a paragraph from United States v. Cassidy (67 Fed. Rep., 700):

The employees of railway companies have a right to organize for mutual benefit and protection and for the purpose of securing the highest wages and the best conditions they can command. They may appoint officers, who shall advise them as to the course to be taken in their relations with their employer, and they may, if they choose, repose in their officers authority to order them, or any of them, on pain of expulsion from their union, peaceably to leave the employment because the terms thereof are unsatisfactory. But it is unlawful for them to combine and quit work for the purpose of compelling their employer to withdraw from his relations with a third party for the purpose of injuring that third party.

This follows the opinion of Judge Taft in Thomas v. Railway (62 Fed., 817).

Again I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the case of United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council (54 Fed., 994). Paragraph 5 of the syllabus reads:

The fact that a combination of men is in its origin and general purposes innocent and lawful is no ground of defense when the combination is turned to the unlawful purpose of restraining interstate and foreign commerce.

A combination of men to secure or compel the employment of none but union men becomes a combination in restraint of interstate commerce within the meaning of the statute when, in order to gain its ends, it seeks to enforce, and does enforce, by violence and intimidation, a discontinuance of labor in all departments of business, including the transportation of goods from State to State and to and from foreign nations.

This is one of the cases which has been referred to repeatedly before our committees as being in support of the proposition that an organization of this character was per se a violation of the law, but an examination of the opinion delivered by Billings, district judge, shows that there were acts of violence of the rankest kind, and a part of the evidence in the case shows this:

To the representative of a morning paper Assistant State Organizer Porter said the outlook for successful strike was most excellent and promised that every union in the city would stand by the locked-out workmen. He said it was possible a general strike would be ordered and that labor is determined to win this struggle. A union man who was with Mr. Porter is represented to have said that the strike will be made a victory of the laboring classes of the city, and unless the unions are recognized there will be more bloodshed than imagined. Mr. Porter is reported to have added, "We propose to win by peace if we can, but if we are pushed to the wall force will be employed."

In this particular case the entire commerce of the city, interstate in character, had been interfered with.

Mr. President, I have here a large number of authorities, and, without taking the time of the Senate to read them all, I ask permission to incorporate them in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Trades-unions are not unlawful combinations so long as they do not resort to acts tending to destroy freedom of action, such as intimidation, threats, or violence. Hence it is not contrary to public policy or illegal for a member of a union to combine with others for the purpose of maintaining wages or limiting the number of apprentices. (Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 46 Am. St. Repts., p. 640.)

Trades-unions and labor organizations must depend for their membership upon the free choice of each member and his perfect freedom of action. No resort can be had to violence, threats, intimidation, or other compulsory methods in matters concerning membership, or to enforce the observance of their laws, rules, and regulations.

Strikes among workingmen are not necessarily unlawful, though they may become both illegal and criminal by the means employed to enforce their objects. Employees may lawfully quit their service either singly or in a body, but if unlawful means are used to uphold or maintain a strike, or if the end to be attained is unlawful, then the strike itself is unlawful. (Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 46 Am. St. Repts., 640.)

In the above-cited case, Judge Wolverton, at page 646, in discussing the statement "that there is no such thing as a legal or peaceful 'strike,'" cites the following case:

Justice Harlan, in the now celebrated case of Arthur v. Oakes (63 Fed. Rep., 327), says: "We are not prepared, in the absence of evidence to hold, as a matter of law, that a combination among employees having for its object their orderly withdrawal in large number or in a body from the service of their employers, on account simply of a reduction in their wages, is not a 'strike' within the meaning of the word as commonly used. Such a withdrawal, although amounting to a strike, is not, as we have already said, either illegal or criminal."

An employee has an unquestionable right to place a price and impose conditions upon his labor at the outset of his employment, or, unless restrained by contract obligations, upon the continuance of his labor at any time thereafter, and, if the terms and conditions are not complied with by the employer, he has a clear right to engage, or having engaged in the service to cease from work, and what one may do all may lawfully combine to do for the purpose of rendering their action more effective. But this right of combination and to strike or quit the employment must be exercised in a peaceable and lawful manner, without violence or destruction of property or other coercive measures intended to prevent the employer from securing other employees, or otherwise carrying on his business according to his own judgment.

It is the right of labor to organize for lawful purposes, and by organic agreement to subject the individual members to rules, regulations, and conduct prescribed by the majority; and the courts can not enjoin the officers or committees of such an organization from counseling or ordering a strike in the exercise of authority given them by the laws and sanctioned by a majority of its members, nor can such action be made the basis of a charge of malicious conspiracy. (Wabash R. R. Co. v. Hannahan et al., 121 Fed., 563.)

The members of a labor union may, singly or in a body, quit the service of their employer; and for the purpose of strengthening their association they may persuade and induce other workmen to join their union, and as a means to that end refuse to allow their members to work where nonunion labor is employed.

It is not unlawful for members of a labor union to go upon premises, with the owner's permission, for the purpose of enticing or ordering their associates to desist from work thereon unless their conduct is so persistent and annoying to the owner or contractor as to constitute a nuisance. (Gray v. Building Trades Council, 103 Am. St. Rep., 477.)

In the above cited case Judge Brown, at page 485, says:

Labor may organize, as capital does, for its own protection and to further the interests of the laboring class. They may strike and persuade and entice others to join them; but when they resort to unlawful means to cause injury to others with whom they have no relation, contractual or otherwise, the limit permitted by law is passed and they may be restrained.

In National Protective Association v. Cummings (170 N. Y., 321), Chief Justice Parker says:

What one man may do alone he may do in combination with others, provided they have no unlawful object in view. Mere numbers do not ordinarily affect the quality of the act. Workingmen have the right to organize for the purpose of securing higher wages, shorter hours of labor, or improving their relations with their employers. They have the right to strike; that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed, provided the object is not to gratify malice or inflict injury upon others, but to secure better terms of employment for themselves. A peaceable and orderly strike, not to harm others but to improve their own condition, is not in violation of law.

This principle was laid down by the lower court and affirmed by the Court of Appeals of New York:

Laborers have a right to organize, and they will not be restrained by injunction from leaving the service of their employers, even though their action in so doing involves a breach of contract; but when the union and its officers and members agree together to prevent the employers from hiring other persons, by calling a strike and using force, threats, intimidation, and picketing, they have entered into an unlawful undertaking, which may be enjoined by a court of chancery. (Franklin Union v. The People, 220 Ill., 357.)

In the foregoing case of Franklin Union v. The People (220 Ill., 357), at page 377, Judge Hand says:

It will be readily conceded by all that labor has the right to organize as well as capital, and that the members of Franklin Union, No. 4, had the same legal right to organize said union as the members of the Chicago Typothetae had to form that association, and that the members of Franklin Union, No. 4, had the legal right to quit the employment, either singly or in a body, of the members of said association, with or without cause, if they saw fit, without rendering themselves amenable to the charge of conspiracy, and that the courts would not have been authorized to enjoin them from so doing even though their leaving the employment of the members of the association involved a breach of contract.

(Ohio, 1889) Workmen have the right to organize into unions for the common benefit of their members, for the purpose of advancing their scale, and for mutual charities. (Parker v. Bricklayers' Union, 10 Ohio, Dec. 458.)

Since the act of 1883 (Rev. Sup., p. 774, N. J.), it is not unlawful in this State for the members of an association to combine together for the purpose of securing control of the work connected with their trade, and to endeavor to effect such purpose by peaceable means. (Mayer et al. v. The Journeymen Stonecutters' Association, N. J. Eq., 47, 519.)

1. Under the Declaration of Rights, article 1, guaranteeing to all men the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, laborers can legally combine into a labor union, with limitation on what it can do by the existence of the same right in every other citizen to pursue his calling as he may deem best, and the further limitation, coming from the increased power of organization, that what is lawful for an individual is not necessarily lawful for a combination. (Pickett v. Walsh, 78 N. E. Rep., 753.)

At one time it was held by the courts that combinations of workmen to effect a desired end were illegal and indictable, but the later authorities both English and American, agree that trade-unions, in the ordinary acceptance of that term, are not unlawful combinations so long as they do not resort to acts of violence or endeavor to accomplish some end that is contrary to public policy. It is then not illegal per se for a union to adopt and endeavor to maintain a scale of wages, or to endeavor to limit and regulate the employment of apprentices.

A "strike" among workmen is not per se illegal or criminal, though it may become both by the means employed to enforce its objects. Workmen may quit the services of an employer, either singly or in a body, as they may see fit, and they may not be either enjoined or prosecuted for so doing unless the end to be attained or the means used to attain it be unlawful. (Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 26 Oreg. Repts., 527.)

In Lake Erie & Western Railway v. Bailey District Judge Baker, in his opinion at page 495 (Fed. Rep., 61), says:

The court recognizes the right of any man or number of men to quit the service of their employers, and it recognizes the right of men to organize if they deem it expedient to better their condition. It also recognizes the hardships of the life of the average laboring man. Their conditions are often such as to touch the sensibilities of a feeling heart. The court is also aware of the scanty wages which they often receive, and of their long and arduous hours of service, frequently exposed to the rigors of an inclement season. * * * I confess I can not look with any degree of tolerance on the false and dangerous teachings of those who actively, or by their silent acquiescence, are teaching labor organizations to think that because they are organized in associations they have the right to seize property or by intimidation to prevent well-disposed people from laboring. * * * I think that such organizations for lawful purposes are to be commended; but when they combine and confederate for the purpose of seizing other men's property, or when they undertake by force and intimidation to drive other men away from employment, and thus deny them the right of earning a livelihood, they commit a crime. There ought to be blazed on the mind of every man that belongs to a labor organization, as with a hot iron so that he shall know and understand it, that while it is lawful and commendable to organize for legitimate and peaceful purposes, it is criminal to organize for the invasion of the rights of others to enjoy life, liberty, and prosperity.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to read a paragraph from the work of Frederick H. Cooke on "Combination, Monopolies, and Labor Unions." In discussing the legality of strikes, at paragraph 53, he says:

As has been seen, there has existed a tendency at least to apply the element of combination as a test of liability for acts of employees. Such tendency has been manifested in the alleged doctrine that a mere combination to obtain an increase of wages is illegal as a criminal conspiracy. The origin of this supposed doctrine appears on a consideration of the social conditions that had prevailed in England for centuries, producing a series of statutes dating as far back as the fourteenth century, operating most oppressively on the laboring classes. But this doctrine never gained foothold in this country, where it has been generally repudiated, and it may be regarded as established here, as a common-law principle, that a combination among wageworkers for the purpose of obtaining an increase of wages as well as for any other lawful purpose is entirely lawful, the only question of legality being as to the means employed. And as a result of recent elaborate investigation it must be considered as settled that the alleged doctrine never existed in England, independently of statute.

Again I desire to read from Judge Anderson in his instructions to the jury in the dynamite cases. He said:

It was not unlawful for the structural ironworkers to organize the union to which they belong. It is not unlawful for the defendants to be members of that or any other labor organization. Men have the right to use their combined power through such organizations to advance their interests in any lawful way; but they have no right to use this power in the violation of the law. Organized labor is not on trial here nor is the right of labor to organize an issue; but members of labor organizations owe the same obedience to the law and are liable to the same punishment for its violation as persons who are not members of such organizations.

(Page 1078 of the hearings before the subcommittees of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, which had under consideration H. R. 15657, Jan. 6, 1913.)

A very interesting work upon this subject of labor conditions is the late work of Martin on The Modern Law of Labor Unions. Sections 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 15 of this work read as follows:

Section 9: The purposes for which combination is permissible—In general.

Broadly speaking, workmen may combine to obtain any legitimate advantage. They may combine for the purpose of raising their intellectual, moral, and social condition, for social enjoyment, to afford members assistance in times of poverty, sickness, and distress; for the advancement and development of the intelligence of the members, and in consequence their skill in their trade or calling; to redress grievances of members; to improve or regulate their relations with their employers; to secure employment for their members; and, according to some decisions, to secure the employment of members in preference to and to the exclusion of other workmen, or to secure control of the work connected with their trade, although, as will be subsequently shown, there is authority which denies the correctness of these last two propositions (pp. 14 and 15).

Section 10: To maintain or advance the rate of wages.

So one of the foremost purposes of organization among workmen is to secure the best wages obtainable, and whatever views may have been formerly entertained on the subject it is no longer open to question that a combination of workmen formed for the purpose of maintaining or advancing the rate of wages is a perfectly legitimate one. They are entitled to the highest wages and the best conditions that they can command. They may fix the price of labor and refuse to work unless it is obtained, and they may have that right both as individuals and in combination. It is of benefit to them and to the public that laborers should unite in common interest and for lawful purposes. They have labor to sell. If they stand together, they are often able, all of them, to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with rich employers, because the necessities of the single employee may compel him to accept any terms offered him. It has been well said that if it is lawful for the stockholders and officers of a corporation to associate together for the purpose of reducing the wages of its employees or of devising other means for making their investment profitable, it is equally lawful for organized labor to associate, consult, and confer with a view to maintain or increase wages (pp. 16 and 17).

Citing numerous cases in all States of the Union.

Section 11: To obtain reduction of hours of employment.

So workmen may lawfully combine to obtain a reduction of the hours of employment, for the same reason that authorizes a combination to advance or maintain the rate of wages. A demand that wages should be paid during working hours amounts merely to a demand for a shorter day and the attainment thereof is a legitimate object of a combination (p. 16).

Section 12: To secure careful and competent fellow workmen.

The securing of careful and competent fellow servants in order to diminish the risk incident to employment is a legitimate object of a combination among laboring men. The reason for this is obvious. In the event of injury by the negligence of a fellow servant, except where the rule is changed by statute, the burden would have to be borne by the injured servant without compensation by the master, and with no financial responsibility as a general rule on the part of those causing the injury (p. 16).

Section 13: To accumulate strike fund or fund for unemployed members.

The accumulation of a strike fund for the support of those who feel that the wages offered are below market prices is one of the legitimate objects of a labor organization, as is also the accumulation of a fund for the unemployed members of the association (p. 17).

Section 15: Limitations on the right of combination.

The limitation on the right of workmen to combine for their own benefit and protection is that in the exercise of this right the property and rights of others must be respected. A labor union being an organization brought about by the exercise on the part of its members of the right of every citizen to pursue his calling as he thinks best is limited in what it can do by the existence of the same right in each and every other citizen to pursue his or their calling as he or they may think best. Workmen who have combined into a union can not have, under the law of equal rights, a liberty of contracting as they please, working when they please, and quitting when they please, which does not belong alike to nonunion men and employers of labor. It was said by an early commentator on the law of trade unions that "every person has a right under the law, as between him and his fellow subject, to full freedom in disposing of his own labor or his own capital according to his own will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others." The law sanctions no combinations either of employers or employees which have for their immediate purpose the injury of another or the unjustifiable interference with his rights and privileges. It is the absolute, unqualified right of every employee, as well as of every other person, to go about his business unmolested and unobstructed, and free from intimidation, force, or duress (pp. 18 and 19).

Mr. President, I dare say that there will be few if any authorities found in conflict with the general principles which have been laid down in the opinions which I have cited or in the text writers to which I have referred.

Now, what becomes of the proposition which is made the basis of this legislation that labor has no right to organize, no right to strike for higher wages or shorter hours or better conditions? No authority has been cited, and, I dare say, none can be cited in this country, where the right to organize, to strike, and to do peaceful picketing is denied, unless it be prohibited by some special statute of some State.

It seems to me that it is unfair to the laboring men themselves, it is unfair to the country, it is unfair to Congress, it is unfair to the courts, to say that there is any principle of law recognized in this country which would permit the dissolution of an organization of employees unless they have been guilty of some unlawful acts. I take it that the friends of this bill would not contend for one moment that if an organization had been once properly organized and set out in a criminal course to do criminal acts that the law ought not to intervene even to the extent of using drastic measures, not to say decreeing dissolution.

Mr. President, under the law, as I conceive it, in this country men may strike for better wages, shorter hours, or, in general, for the betterment of their condition, and they may do peaceful picketing. Why, then, should we attempt to change this law, and to change it in the form that it is here in section 7? This section, note, attempts to say "that nothing in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help," and so forth, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organization from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; and then the last paragraph says:

Nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

The first part of this section permits their operation without any qualification of any kind. When it comes to the individual members it says, "or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organization from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof." There is no qualification at all on the operation of the organization. The individual must act lawfully. Applying the usual rules of construction, it follows that the operation of the organization may be either lawful or unlawful, legitimate or illegitimate. Why limit the individual to lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects of the organization and place no limitation on the organization?

Again, what are the legitimate objects? Why not attempt to define them? No one has attempted it. Does the word "legitimate" not cover every attempt that may be made to accomplish their purpose? Does it mean that the commerce of the country may be entirely tied up by the efforts of some men who do not appreciate the obligation of citizenship? Does it mean that it shall be confined to efforts to obtain a reasonable wage or a wage that would be concededly unreasonable under any and all circumstances? Does it mean to apply only to the obtaining of reasonable hours, or does it permit them to demand unreasonably short hours? Does it mean they may strive for reasonably good conditions, or for conditions which it would be impossible for the average employer to bestow? It seems to me that if this is to become the law there ought to be some attempt to explain what was in the mind of Congress when it attempted to place it upon the statute books. Again, the last paragraph:

Nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Does it mean under no circumstances? Does it mean no matter what their acts are, they shall not be amenable to the law?

Mr. President, most of the laboring men are high-class men, of high purpose and high character. They want their rights and they want to be law-abiding citizens. It is not for that class of men that laws are made. We all recognize the fact that in every avenue of life there are men who will transgress the law and who do transgress the law. I recognize the fact that there are many employers in this country who have ground their labor down, and for them I have no word of sympathy of any kind. On the other hand, we must be entirely fair in this matter and at the same time we have in mind the employers who are unfair we must remember that there are some men who are speaking in the name of labor who likewise are unfair. Laboring men should not be placed at the mercy of the merciless employer. On the other hand, the good employers—and that embraces the greater part of them—ought not to be placed at the mercy of a few labor leaders who do not have a proper appreciation of their duty to the public. There are two sides to this question, as there are to most questions.

Mr. President, I know it is contended that the arm of injunction should never be used in connection with these disturbances. I concede that it has been too frequently used—used when it ought not to have been used—and injunctions granted without notice. Of course, that should be corrected; but, on the other hand, permit me to say that I believe the injunction has often prevented violence which all would regret had it occurred. I recognize the fact that most of the labor leaders of this country abhor violence; that they teach and speak against it; that they give their commands against it. But we all know that it sometimes happens that the wisest and most influential of leaders can not control some of their men. What is to be done under those circumstances?

Mr. President, when there is a labor disturbance generally the first desire is to have some sort of mediation or adjustment. I wish that were always true. The second is, if there is likely to be any disturbance the officers of the peace are called in. If that fails then the practice has been to invoke the equity arm of the court to stay any effort at violence. If that fails, what next? There is only one other recourse, and that is to call in the military where there is such a disturbance as can not be controlled by other means.

Am I wrong when I say that by so much as you cripple the arm of injuction in a proper case, by so much you are increasing the possibility of calling out the military? I hope the day will never come in this country when the military will be called out to stay any labor difficulty of any kind. The public will not tolerate violence. The peace must be preserved. If it can not be done by the police or the courts, the military will be summoned. Ought we not to use the courts where we can, and only resort to the military when all other possible means have failed?

Mr. President, my belief has always been that labor and capital are not to be treated as if in two separate camps. They are partners in a common purpose. They ought to be together. I believe in industrial peace. I do not believe in industrial war, and that is the basic thought in this section in my judgment. Section 7 and section 18 treat this subject as if employer and employee were in two opposing camps. You are never going to get these two elements of our society together by that kind of means. I will do anything in my power to bring them together, either by vote or voice. I will not do anything consciously to get them apart, and if there is a proper disposition exercised by employer and employee there will be less of trouble in this country.

Permit me to call the attention of the Senate to a beautiful picture of the relations which exist between one of the great employers in Ohio and his employees. I read a paragraph from a speech delivered by Col. James Kilbourne, president of the Kilbourne & Jacobs Manufacturing Co., in the city of Columbus, one of the largest employers of labor in central Ohio. Speaking of the hard times during the panic of 1893, 1894, and 1895, he says:

I could relate innumerable instances showing their loyalty—

Referring to his employees—

and devotion to our interests, but one will, I think, suffice, the like of which I have never heard of before or since. Some weeks after the beginning of the great panic of 1893, when trouble and desolation were spreading over the land, there filed into my office at our shops one morning some 15 or 20 men, representing the different shops of our works. They bore serious countenances and a serious manner, and my heart sank within me. One of my most earnest hopes had been that there should never be any trouble between our employees and myself, and I thought, "Here it has come at last."

Finally one of the men arose and said: "Mr. Kilbourne, we have hesitated about coming here; we have thought about it a great deal, and believe we are right, and we hope you will receive the suggestion we have to make in the spirit in which it is offered. We have seen in the daily papers accounts of the failure of this firm and that firm and the other firm, which had existed for many years, and were thought to be strong enough to resist any panic. We know that your warehouses are filling up with goods. We know that, as is the case with other manufacturers, you can not sell the goods you are making to-day and can not get your pay for the goods you have sold. We do not know what your circumstances are, but we fear they may be like those of other men who have failed. Some of us have been here a few years, some of us many years, some of us almost a generation. We have had good pay, we have been able to save up some money, and while the individual savings are not very large, the aggregate is a very considerable sum. We have come to tell you that it is all yours, to do with it what you please, if you need it in the interests of your company."

That is a picture of conditions as they ought to prevail in every factory, and that is a condition which would prevail in many instances if the extremists on both sides of this proposition were more disposed to get together, and I trust that the Congress will help them to get together.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to another peculiar provision of this section 7. For some unaccountable reason it has been sought to place in this section a provision exempting agricultural associations from the provisions of the Sherman law. I should like to know where the sentiment comes from that demands it. We have agricultural organizations galore in my State, doing splendid work. I have not heard from a single one who asked that agricultural organizations should be included in an exemption under this law.

On the contrary, Hon. A. P. Sandles, president of the Agricultural Commission of Ohio, writes me under date of July 10, 1914:

You are right in opposing exemption of farmers from provisions of antitrust laws.

Farmers ask no favors. Justice and equal consideration in governmental affairs is their creed and demand.

During the past week or 10 days the papers of the country have been calling attention to the increasingly high cost of living. Products of all kinds that are offered in the markets are going higher and higher. It has attracted the attention of the President himself. Congressmen have desired it to be investigated. All over the United States social organizations are inquiring into it. Everybody regrets it. We thought we were about to reduce the price of living, and I think, all things considered, we have done so by some of our legislation. And now comes a proposition whereby the Congress is putting itself on record to legitimatize agricultural organizations for the purpose of increasing the cost of living. Consistency ought to be a jewel now as it has been in other days.

One of the peculiar ironies of this section is this: There are consumers' leagues all over the country, and one of their objects is to reduce the cost of living, and they are eliminated from this bill. So if consumers were to get together and combine in interstate matters in an effort to reduce the cost of articles and thereby restrain trade, they would be amenable to the law; but the bill allows the producers of the country to get together for the purpose of increasing the price. It denies to the consumer the right to combine to reduce the cost of living while it gives the producer the right to combine to increase the price of his produce.

Mr. President, the labor and agricultural provisions of this bill received consideration at the hands of Congress during the closing days of the administration of President Taft. He vetoed the sundry civil appropriation bill at the time for two reasons—first, because he doubted its constitutionality, and, secondly, because he doubted the policy of it. I do not care this afternoon to discuss the question of the constitutionality of this provision. I am frank to say that I am disposed to think that Congress in its wisdom might eliminate both classes from the operation of the Sherman law, though I am not certain about it. I address myself only to the question of the policy.

Later on, when this same bill was passed by the present Congress, President Wilson said in signing the bill:

I have signed this bill because I can do so without, in fact, limiting the opportunity or the power of the Department of Justice to prosecute violations of the law by whomsoever committed.

If I could have separated from the rest of the bill the item which authorized the expenditure by the Department of Justice of a special sum of $300,000 for the prosecution of violations of the antitrust law, I would have vetoed that item, because it places upon the expenditure a limitation which is, in my opinion, unjustifiable in character and principle. But I could not separate it. I do not understand that the limitation was intended as either an amendment or an interpretation of the antitrust law, but merely as an expression of the opinion of the Congress—a very emphatic opinion, backed by an overwhelming majority of the House of Representatives and a large majority of the Senate, but not intended to touch anything but the expenditure of a single small additional fund.

If it was wrong in principle at that time to exempt any element of society from the provisions of the law it seems to me that the same rule should obtain now.

Mr. President, section 18 of this bill is to my mind of somewhat uncertain phraseology. I have been trying to find out what it means. I trust I am guilty of no impropriety when I say that I have had three different opinions from members of the Judiciary Committee: One to the effect that it legalizes the secondary boycott; another to the effect that it does not; and the third to the effect that he did not know. I should like to know whether it does or not. It is pretty difficult to understand the language which is used in the middle of this section:

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons whether singly or in concert from terminating any relation of employment or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from withholding their patronage from any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do.

Does that apply simply to the employer and the employee or does it apply to the use of means in connection with a third party? I do not know. If it is simply a legalizing of the primary boycott it is legal now; if it is an attempt to legalize the secondary boycott I am opposed to it, and I understand that most of the States have legislation upon that subject. I think that in principle it is altogether vicious.

Let me call attention to some of the examples of secondary boycott.

I take a different view of this subject from that of some of my friends. I do not believe that this struggle is going to be fashioned after the manner of war. If there is a difference between the employer and the employee and they can not agree, the employees can strike or there can be a lockout, and all the peaceful means incident to such methods may be employed; but because I, as an employee, have a difference with a company employing me and we can not agree, is that any reason why I should attempt to embroil somebody who may be in California in his relations with my employer? There must be an end somewhere.

Let me suggest, before I go into this matter further, that this bill, if it should be enacted, can have no effect upon intrastate commerce; it only applies to interstate commerce. When we are trying to weigh the merits and the demerits of a bill we ought to give grave consideration to the question as to whether or not the good that is to be accomplished is outweighed by the evil that may be consequent upon such legislation.

If this section means to legalize the secondary boycott, there is no limitation here of any kind; it legalizes all kinds of boycotts. Now, let us see how good a weapon that is. It was employed in the anthracite coal strike, and there is a splendid report on that subject by the commission which was appointed by President Roosevelt, consisting of Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson, Mr. E. W. Parker, Judge George Gray, Mr. Edgar E. Clark, Mr. Thomas H. Watkins, and Bishop John L. Spalding. Under date of March 18, 1903, they submitted their report. I want to read a paragraph from it:

Examples of such "secondary boycotts" are not wanting in the record of the case before the commission. A young schoolmistress, of intelligence, character, and attainments, was so boycotted and her dismissal from employment compelled for no other reason than that a brother, not living in her immediate family, chose to work contrary to the wishes and will of the striking miners. A lad, about 15 years old, employed in a drug store, was discharged, owing to threats made to his employer by a delegation of the strikers, on behalf of their organization, for the reason that his father had chosen to return to work before the strike was ended. In several instances tradesmen were threatened with a boycott—that is, that all connected with the strikers would withhold from them their custom and persuade others to do so—if they continued to furnish the necessaries of life to the families of certain workmen, who had come under the ban of the displeasure of the striking organizations. This was carrying the boycott to an extent which was condemned by Mr. Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in his testimony before the commission, and which certainly deserves the reprobation of all thoughtful and law-abiding citizens. Many other instances of boycott are disclosed in the record of this case.

Again, at page 78 of the report, the commission says:

The practices which we are condemning would be outside the pale of civilized war. In civilized warfare, women and children and the defenseless are safe from attack, and a code of honor controls the parties to such warfare which cries out against the boycott we have in view. Cruel and cowardly are terms not too severe by which to characterize it.

If you will turn to the record of the testimony of this case you will find that the words "cruel and cowardly" were the words used by Mr. Mitchell himself; and yet if this section legalizes the secondary boycott, the Congress of the United States is called upon to give an indorsement to conduct of this kind which is cruel and cowardly. The report continues:

The commission is of opinion, however, that there should be a positive utterance on its part relative to discrimination, interference, boycotting, and blacklisting, and this opinion it has put in the form of an award, as follows:

"It is adjudged and awarded: That no person shall be refused employment, or in any way discriminated against, on account of membership or nonmembership in any labor organization; and that there shall be no discrimination against, or interference with, any employee who is not a member of any labor organization by members of such organization."

Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of the Senate the views of some of the labor leaders themselves upon the question of boycott. I have here at my desk the work of Harry W. Laidler on Boycotts and the Labor Struggle. On page 97 the author quotes from the reports of the bureau of statistics and labor of New York State, and I ask to introduce that without reading, because I do not care to take the time to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The boycott is not in this country attended with violence, except in the case of foreigners.

Organized labor has attained that period in its development when it can see the necessity of wielding this potent weapon with extreme caution. Time was when the boycott was declared at the slightest provocation. Not so now, for the record proves that the organizations are loath to use it except in a prudent way, and then as a last resort.

The injury to labor of any abuse is thus stated:

It (the boycott) has nearly always proved successful when the parties who applied it represented a public or moral sentiment. If it is allowed to degenerate into a simple fight between competing firms, and if the pretended leaders of the labor movement assume to apply it indiscriminately, foolishly, and maliciously, it will result in complete disaster to the movement itself.

The attitude of labor leaders concerning the boycott's use is thus set forth:

It may be remarked that the more advanced thinkers in the ranks of labor disapprove of the boycott except in extreme cases in which no ordinary remedy is attainable.

Mr. POMERENE. Again, on page 107, the author says:

If wielded thoughtlessly the boycott on the transportation system could undoubtedly play havoc with the business of the country. On the other hand, there is no business in which the abuse in the conduct of this weapon brings a more immediate and pronounced condemnation from the public.

At page 110, the author says, with respect to the convention of the American Federation of Labor held in 1885:

In this convention the unscrupulous use of the boycott by other organizations, presumably the Knights of Labor, was vigorously condemned. These organizations were accused of employing this weapon on "frivolous, trivial, and imaginary grievances" without giving the question the attention and thorough investigation which it required. The convention voted that no boycott be approved by the federation, until it had been carefully considered by the legal committee.

* * * * * * *

In its convention in 1886 the author says:

It advocated only the boycott's careful and energetic use as a last resort.

* * * * * * *

On page 111 the author says:

The federation, in 1898, took a decided stand against the circularizing of its unions with boycott literature without its official indorsement, declaring that "the continuous and overwhelming flood of boycott circulars leads to confusion and ineffectiveness." The same year it took steps toward limiting particularly boycotts of those firms employing union men. The resolution read:

"Whereas the placing of a boycott upon any product the manufacture of which is participated in by two or more crafts may and often does work an injury to union workers: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor shall indorse no boycott where the products of several organized unions will be affected thereby until every possible effort has been made to secure a settlement, and all organizations to be affected shall be given a hearing and an opportunity to assist in securing a settlement in which the existing grievance may be settled."

On page 112 the author says:

The boycott committee in 1904 clearly voiced the sentiment of the delegates in its declaration that "if anyone is unjustly placed on the unfair list it tends to injure not only the organization directly in interest, but the entire labor movement."

In 1905 (see Laidler on Boycotts, p. 113) Owen Miller, chairman of the boycott committee of the American Federation of Labor, reported to the convention:

We must recognize the fact that the boycott means war, and to carry on a war successfully we must adopt the tactics that history has shown are most successful in war. The greatest master of war said that war was the trade of a barbarian and the secret of success was to concentrate all forces upon one point of the enemy—the weakest if possible.

In view of these facts the committee recommends that the State federations and central bodies lay aside minor grievances and concentrate their efforts and energies upon the least number of unfair parties or places in their jurisdiction. One would be preferable. If every available means at the command of the State federations and central bodies were concentrated upon one such and kept up until successful, the next on the list would be more easily brought to terms, and within a reasonable time none opposed to fair wages, conditions, or hours, but would be brought to see the error of its ways and submit to the inevitable.

President Gompers, in speaking of the boycott, said (see Laidler on Boycotts, p. 114):

The workers fully realize that the boycott and strike are means to be used to maintain their rights and to promote their welfare when seriously threatened by hostile, greedy, and unfair employers when no other remedy seems available. With the boycott cleared of wrongful charges and misapprehension and recognized as a lawful right we will find its use diminishing. It will be a power held in reserve and used only when no other remedy is adequate.

We have this anomalous situation: We are asked to legalize an instrument like the secondary boycott, which has been fraught with so much harm not only to the country at large but, according to these authorities and the declaration of the Federation of Labor itself, often to the labor organizations. We are asked to say that there shall be no restraint in the handling of this instrument, save the free will of those who use it.

According to Mr. Gompers:

With the boycott cleared of wrongful charges and misapprehension and recognized as a lawful right, we will find its use diminishing.

In other words, when it is not recognized, when there is no statute regulating it, there will be more perfect peace. "We do not want Government regulation of this instrument, and then we will cease to use it." A defiance of the law by a few—and there are only a few who do it—never breeds respect for any law or any man's rights. By the force of this same logic we should repeal all statutory laws making certain acts penal, because if we did there would be more respect shown for the rights of men.

Mr. President, when we do know that the boycott has been used in such ways as to bring down the condemnation of the labor leaders themselves, such as John Mitchell, it is not quite the right time to come in and legalize that which, in John Mitchell's own words, sometimes, as in the case of the anthracite coal strike in the instances to which I have referred, is "cruel and cowardly."

Mr. President, I fear that in the consideration of this subject we sometimes lose sight of the great third party—the public. I have never heard of a struggle between employer and employee that I did not feel that there were three parties to be considered—the employee, the employer, and the great third party, which embraces both of them, the public.

While we recognize the right to strike—and I would not have it otherwise—it is not always a means of securing what is desired. Workingmen now have a right to strike, but everyone must concede that the fewer times that right is exercised the better. It is of inestimable value, but, paradoxical as it may seem, the less it is used the greater its value.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to some of the statistics upon this subject. I take the following figures from the twenty-first annual report of the Labor Bureau, made in 1906, on the subject of strikes and lockouts, as contained in House Document No. 110:

In the period of 25 years (1881 to 1905) there were in the United States:

Strikes	36,757
Lockouts	1,546
Total disturbances	38,303
Strikes occurred in establishments	181,407
Lockouts occurred in do	18,547
Total	199,954
Total persons involved during said period in strikes	6,728,048
Number of persons locked out	716,231
Total	7,444,279
Total number during said period thrown out of employment:
By strikes	8,703,824
By lockouts	825,610
Total	9,529,434

Of the 36,757 strikes from 1881 to 1905, there were:

	Per cent.
Ordered by labor organizations	68.99
Begun by employees who were not members of organizations, or who, if members, went on strike without sanction of the organizations	31.01

Of the 181,407 establishments involved in strikes, 90.34 per cent were included in strikes ordered by organizations.

Strikes ordered by labor organizations included 79.69 per cent of all strikers and 77.45 per cent of the total persons thrown out of work in establishments involved in strikes.

Average duration per establishment:

	Days.
Of strikes	25.4
Of lockouts	84.6

Employees won all demands undertaken by strikes in 47.95 per cent of the establishments, succeeded partly in 15.28 per cent of the establishments, failed to win any of their demands in 36.78 per cent.

Lockouts resulted favorable to employers in 57.20 per cent of the establishments, succeeded partly in 10.71 per cent of the establishments, failed in 32.09 per cent.

Strikes ordered by labor organizations were wholly successful in 49.48 per cent of the establishments involved, partly successful in 15.87 per cent, failed in 34.65 per cent.

Strikes not ordered by labor organizations were successful in 33.88 per cent of the establishments involved, partly successful in 9.85 per cent, failed in 56.31 per cent of the establishments.

Eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty-one strikes, or 32.24 per cent of all strikes, were for increase of wages alone; 3,117 strikes, or 40.72 per cent of all strikes, due in whole or in part to demands for increase of wages.

The next most fruitful cause of strikes was disagreement concerning recognition of union and union rules. This cause alone produced 18.84 per cent of all strikes, and both alone and combined with other causes, 23.35 per cent of all strikes.

Objection to reduction of wages alone and combined with other causes produced 11.90 per cent of all strikes.

Demands for reduction of hours alone and combined with other causes produced 9.78 per cent of all strikes.

The most important cause of lockouts was disputes concerning recognition of union and union rules and employers' organization, which cause, alone and combined with various causes, produced nearly one-half of all lockouts and included more than one-half of all establishments involved in lockouts.

Now, Mr. President, let us see how expensive these strikes were. I refer to these matters because I have always felt that if those who are interested on both sides of this problem would in a proper spirit try to get together two-thirds at least of the labor troubles could be avoided and both would profit thereby. Mr. Carroll D. Wright, in an article on arbitration in a book entitled "Labor and Capital," at pages 153 and 154, says:

The record of strikes in the United States for the 20 years ending December 31, 1900, as shown by the United States Department of Labor, would seem to indicate that at times, at least, some drastic measure for the prevention of conflicts might be desirable. This record is that during the period named there were 22,793 strikes, with a wage loss of $257,863,478, a loss through assistance rendered by labor organizations of $16,174,793, and a loss to employers of $122,731,121. The lockouts during the same period numbered 1,005, with a wage loss to employees of $48,819,745, a loss through assistance rendered by labor organizations of $3,451,461, and a loss to employers of $19,927,983. The total losses by strikes and lockouts reached the vast sum of $468,968,581.

Four hundred and sixty-eight million dollars! Is it not worth while to get both employer and employee together rather than to attempt to pass some legislation which treats the subject as if they were warring factions?

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this fact especially: This legislation will not affect those who are engaged purely in manufacturing or mercantile or mining occupations unless the transaction assumes an interstate character. It does affect all those who are engaged in transportation of every character—a matter which is peculiarly a subject for congressional control; a matter to which we ought always to give our most considerate attention. As a matter of fact, the legislation that is here asked is not in the interest of the whole people; it is not in the interest of the laboring classes as a whole; but rather, in view of its interstate character, it should be called legislation in favor of a part of labor as against all labor and as against all the rest of the 100,000,000 inhabitants of the United States.

Let us see how this will operate. A little more than a year ago Congress was called upon suddenly one morning to pass a law providing for mediation of the differences existing between the railways east of Chicago and their employees. We were told that if the bill did not pass within 48 hours all traffic east of Chicago would be tied up. Do we appreciate what that would mean? The bill was passed. The matters were submitted to arbitration. They were settled. A part of the demands of the employees were granted, but not in full. If that award means anything it means that they were reasonable in a part of their demands and they were unreasonable in a part of their demands.

Now, let us suppose that instead of a threatened strike the railways had gotten together and had said, "It is going to be to our interest to combine together and reduce the wages of these employees below a living wage," what would have been the result? The men would have left their employment, and properly so; but the consequence would have been that transportation east of Chicago would have been stopped, and in 10 days centers of population like New York, and Boston, and Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, and Cleveland would have been starved.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. POMERENE. I would prefer not to be interrupted. A little later, after I have finished, I shall be glad to yield, but I prefer not to break the thread of my argument.

Mr. HUGHES. The question I wanted to ask the Senator was right in line with something he has just said.

Mr. POMERENE. Possibly I shall meet it as I go along.

On the other hand, suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the demands of the brotherhoods of railway men had been excessive; that they had asked for something which the transportation lines could not pay; that they had asked for something which in the minds of all reasonable men would have been excessive, and, their demands having been denied, they strike. Traffic would have stopped. Transportation would have stopped. The result on the great centers of population, like New York, and Philadelphia, and Boston, and Pittsburgh, and Cleveland, would have been the same. It is the restraint of trade that we are looking to, and that should be the object of our most respectful attention. What would have been the consequences if they had arbitrarily assumed a stand of this character and their demands had been unreasonable? Who would have suffered in either instance? Would it have been the rich men of New York City or any other of these centers of population? Would it have been the employer class? Yes; but the suffering of the employer would not have been a tithe compared with the suffering of the laboring men in these great cities and of their wives and families, though their relations with their employers might have been most harmonious in character.

Let us take another illustration: Suppose this had been in the dead of winter, and in the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania or the bituminous regions of West Virginia the coal was being taken out. We will assume that the relations between the employers and the miners were most harmonious. They were getting out their coal, ready to ship it to the centers of population to keep the men and the women and the children there from freezing, and the only thing that stood in the way was the lack of means of transportation. The employers in the mining regions, if they could not market their coal, could not pay their men, and the result would be suffering and distress there.

I do not think this situation is likely to arise; but we know we have been on the very brink of such a situation; and only a few days ago one arose with reference to the transportation lines west of Chicago, and we were told that in a short day there was a probability that all the traffic west of Chicago would be tied up if there were not an adjustment. I more than appreciate the splendid efforts of the men on both sides of that controversy to get together and agree to arbitrate and to adjust their differences; but we know, as a matter of experience, that there have been cases in this country which they did not arbitrate. They could not, it seemed. Because of the passion that may have prevailed on both sides, they were not able to arbitrate. Beyond that, let us go a little further. If everyone during a situation such as I have described would keep an even temper, all might go well; but we know that in cases of excitement such as I have referred to there are men who do not control their tempers. They may be sometimes leaders of men on both sides of the proposition, and a little encouragement is given here, a little encouragement there, and the first thing we know the match is applied to the magazine, and there is an explosion that distresses the entire country; and with these strikes there come threats, intimidation, and violence to both person and property.

I am not saying that one side is any more to blame than the other, but I do say that when it comes to a proposition such as this the Government should not tie its hands and prevent itself from making, not an undue use of the power of injunction, but a proper use of the power of injunction. An injunction tends to peace, not to violence. When violence begins the cause is losing ground.

I want to say that while I have the most profound respect for the men who are at the head of the American Federation of Labor and at the heads of the various brotherhoods, we know that sometimes wrongs occur. The best of us may to-day be in a perfectly equable frame of mind, but to-morrow lose our tempers in the intensity of excitement; and we are not always responsible for things which may be done, and if we do control ourselves we are not always able to control those who may be under us.

Let me make a further suggestion in this connection. Let us suppose there should be a strike; that transportation should be tied up; that the courts of equity are not open. We have bound their hands. The public becomes excited. If we were to prohibit the issuance of injunctions what might not happen? If we were to pass a bill which in a proper case would prevent the use of the equity arm, what would our Senators from the South say to the cotton farmer when he could not market his product because transportation was stopped and strikers would not permit the management to resume? What are Senators from the great wheat-growing regions going to say to their constituents when transportation in that region is tied up? What are Senators from the great centers of population going to say if we cripple the hands of the courts so that fuel in the wintertime and food products at all times may not be brought to warm those who are cold and freezing and to feed the hungry?

I recognize the fact that courts have made mistakes, but I want to say at the same time that while some judges have issued wrong decrees they are the exception and not the rule. I am not willing to say, when it comes to a proposition such as this, that the courts are always wrong and that the organizations are always right. I hope there may never be another excuse for applying to a court in any labor struggle of any kind, but I do think a study of poor, weak human nature shows that it is sometimes necessary.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to another very interesting feature of section 18. I read only that part of the section which is pertinent to the point I have in mind:

> That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof—
> In controversies between employers and employees—
> unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right.

You must show that there is an irreparable injury to property or to a property right before an injunction shall be granted. In other words, if the employer's property is threatened with violence, if some one goes down in the midst of the trouble and threatens the business, the property, the machinery, the plant itself, and there is no adequate remedy at law, in order to protect that property and that property right an injunction may be issued; but if the men who are employed there are threatened, if they are to be fired at, you can not protect them by the power of injunction. Under section 18, as it is drawn, we have the anomalous situation that property has become more sacred than life or limb or safety!

Mr. President, I have occupied more of the time of the Senate than I had expected to occupy. I say, as I began, that with most of the provisions of this bill I am in entire accord; but I can not give my consent to the exemption of any organization from the operation of the Sherman law. My belief is, as I have instanced in the case of the transportation companies, that the possibilities of harm to the laboring classes and to all classes of our population by the enactment of those parts of this bill to which I have registered my objections would far outweigh any possible good to the laboring classes.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. I want to get the Senator's idea of the effect of the present law upon these transportation strikes. The Senator described a set of circumstances which existed a few days ago and which threatened to involve all the railroads west of Chicago, I think the Senator said, in a general strike. He followed that up by saying that the natural result of that would be a terrific restraint of trade. Now, if that had happened; if that restraint of trade had occurred; if there had been a combination or agreement or conspiracy—call it what you will—of all the employees of all those railroads west of Chicago, and that had resulted, as it necessarily must have resulted, in an absolute restraint or cessation of trade, does the Senator think those conspirators or those in that combination or agreement would have come within the terms of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. POMERENE. On the Senator's statement of facts alone, I do not think so; but there are always, let me say——

Mr. HUGHES. I will ask the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me a moment, please. Let me suggest that it is easy enough to pick out a few innocent facts in these matters, on the one hand——

Mr. HUGHES. I am taking the facts the Senator set out.

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment. Or, on the other hand, to select out all adverse facts; and when we do that, on either side, we are not presenting the situation properly. We know, however, that when there is a condition such as I have described there are always other circumstances which become involved, which, together with what I have described, would make out a perfect case under the law.

Mr. HUGHES. It seems to me that if anything is plain it must be plain that the simultaneous withdrawal from employment on the part of men who are engaged in carrying goods from State to State must result in a restraint of trade. If the Senator thinks it does not, and says so, why, that is all I have to say. I can not imagine a more complete restraint of trade.

Mr. POMERENE. Not those facts alone, but——

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator said in his speech that it would be a restraint of trade.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand all that. It would be a restraint of trade, but the facts which I have referred to alone, perhaps, in the hurried argument I was making, might not make out a case; but there are often other facts and circumstances accompanying these strikes. For instance, if the railroads should attempt to move their trains by the employment of other men, and were to be interfered with, then certainly a court would interfere.

Mr. HUGHES. I just want to get at the Senator's view, because it is very important. The Senator, then, thinks that the simultaneous withdrawal of a lot of engineers and firemen which resulted in tying up all the railroads west of Chicago, so that no commerce at all could be moved by rail, would not be a restraint of trade unless it was accompanied by violence?

Mr. POMERENE. It is a restraint of trade. Those facts alone, however, without any other complications, might not be a violation of this law.

Mr. HUGHES. It would be a restraint of trade; would it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly it would; but the restraint of trade——

Mr. HUGHES. The statute is directed against restraints of trade.

Mr. POMERENE. Undue restraints.

Mr. HUGHES. It is directed against restraints of trade. The Senator knows that.

Mr. POMERENE. As construed by the Supreme Court, it is an undue restraint of trade.

Mr. HUGHES. An unreasonable restraint of trade.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, surely, if any restraint of trade would be unreasonable, a restraint of trade would be unreasonable which involved every railroad west of Chicago and cut the country in half, and left one half of it with its goods piling up and the other half of the country starving for them. No court could hold that that was reasonable.

Mr. POMERENE. Under those circumstances, would you cripple the law as it now is?

Mr. HUGHES. Would I cripple it? Would I interfere with the right of those men to withdraw?

Mr. POMERENE. Would you interfere with the enforcement of this law if it could be enforced, or if the circumstances were such as to justify it?

Mr. HUGHES. I would interfere with any law that attempted to prevent any American workingman from quitting his job when he got ready, either singly or in combination with anybody else.

Mr. POMERENE. So would I.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator does not say that.

Mr. POMERENE. I do say that, and I say it now.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator turned to me and challenged my statement, and asked me if I would interfere with the law if it prevented that thing.

Mr. POMERENE. My question was whether you would cripple the law under the circumstances.

Mr. HUGHES. I would cripple the law. What would the Senator do?

Mr. POMERENE. I would protect the public, always.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well. Then the Senator would prevent those men from withdrawing simultaneously from that employment.

Mr. POMERENE. If the facts and complications were such as to justify it, under the law, I certainly would do it.

Mr. HUGHES. That is all I want to know.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD a reference to the opinion by Judge Dayton which was referred to a short time ago by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. It is in the case of Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. against Mitchell et al., in the United States District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia, decided December 23, 1912, and reported in Two hundred and second Federal Reporter, at page 512. At the conclusion of his opinion Judge Dayton says:

> In Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S., 274; 28 Sup. Ct., 301) it was held that the Sherman Antitrust Act "prohibits any combination whatever to secure action which essentially obstructs the free flow of commerce between the States, or restricts, in that regard, the liberty of a trader to engage in business; and this includes restraints of trade aimed at compelling third parties and strangers involuntarily not to engage in the course of interstate trade except on conditions that the combination imposes," and that it "makes no distinction between classes. Organizations of farmers and laborers were not exempted from its operation, notwithstanding the efforts which the records of Congress show were made in that direction," and that "a combination of labor organizations and the members thereof, to compel a manufacturer whose goods are almost entirely sold in other States, to unionize his shops, and on his refusal so to do to boycott his goods and prevent their sale in States other than his own until such time as the resulting damage forces him to comply with their demands," is a "combination in restraint of trade."

That is found in Two hundred and second Federal Reporter, at page 556.

APPEALS IN CUSTOMS CASES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have a little bill passed which is, I think, an emergency measure. It is recommended by the Judiciary Committee. It grants an appeal in customs cases from the Court of Customs Appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury has not that power. There are great questions now in that court involving treaty questions and constitutional questions, and he is bound by the decision of one court. The bill simply provides that he may make an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6116) to amend section 195 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the law relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Does not the Senator think that matters of this kind could go over until the morning hour?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no morning hour. That is the trouble.

Mr. JONES. Why can we not have one?

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope we can soon.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think we will have one if different matters are disposed of in this way?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we will have a morning hour soon; but this is a matter which ought to be attended to at once. I think we will have a morning hour in a few days anyway.

Mr. JONES. That is very encouraging, I am sure. Why is it that we can not have a morning hour almost every day?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we can have soon. Does the Senator from Washington object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; three-fourths of the membership of the committee agreed to it; all the members I could see.

Mr. JONES. There was no objection on the part of any member?

Mr. OVERMAN. There was no objection on the part of any member of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I do not think I shall object to the consideration of this bill; but I do not think I shall consent to such matters coming up hereafter in this way, because it seems to me it would be very easy for us to adjourn from day to day. I think we would get along just about as fast as we are doing now, and thus we would be given an opportunity to take up such matters in the morning hour. Our friends do not seem to be crowding the pending measure very rapidly anyway, and I can see no necessity for keeping one day running along for a week or two. However, I am not going to object to this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would not ask for its consideration if it was not a very important matter and one that ought to be passed at once.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to emphasize what the Senator from Washington has just said. There is not going to be a very lengthy debate, apparently, on the unfinished business, and it does seem to me that we might well return to the old custom of adjourning and meeting at 11 o'clock. That gives us seven long hours.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we will come to that pretty soon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust so. I wish the Senator would use his persuasive influence with the leader on the other side and let us have an adjournment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall be glad to take it up with him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 195 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, so as to read:

> SEC. 195. That the Court of Customs Appeals established by this chapter shall exercise exclusive appellate jurisdiction to review by appeal, as herein provided, final decisions by a board of general appraisers in all cases as to the construction of the law and the facts respecting the classification of merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classifications, and the fees and charges connected therewith, and all appealable questions as to the jurisdiction of said board, and all appealable questions as to the laws and regulations governing the collection of the customs revenues; and the judgments and decrees of said Court of Customs Appeals shall be final in all such cases: Provided, however, That in any case in which the judgment or decree of the Court of Customs Appeals is made final by the provisions of this title, it shall be competent for the Supreme Court, upon the petition of either party, filed within 60 days next after the issue by the Court of Customs Appeals of its mandate upon decision, in any case in which there is drawn in question the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or any part thereof, or of any treaty made pursuant thereto, or in any other case when the Attorney General of the United States shall, before the decision of the Court of Customs Appeals is rendered, file with the court a certificate to the effect that the case is of such importance as to render expedient its review by the Supreme Court, to require, by certiorari or otherwise, such case to be certified to the Supreme Court for its review and determination, with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any case involving only the construction of section 1, or any portion thereof, of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, nor to any case involving the construction of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1911.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 654. An act to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes; and

S. 5198. An act to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Pike National Forest.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5197) granting public lands to the city and county of Denver, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5574) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5739) to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5977) to authorize Bryan Henry and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala., with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4651. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the trustees of the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, of Oldtown, Me.;

H. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Ninth International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of San Francisco, State of California, July 18 to 24, 1915; and

H. J. Res. 246. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a revocable license for the use of lands adjoining the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 816. An act for the relief of Abraham Hoover;

H. R. 1516. An act for the relief of Thomas F. Howell;

H. R. 1528. An act for the relief of T. A. Roseberry;

H. R. 2728. An act for the relief of George P. Heard;

H. R. 3920. An act for the relief of William E. Murray;

H. R. 6420. An act for the relief of Ella M. Ewart;

H. R. 6609. An act for the relief of Arthur E. Rump;

H. R. 9829. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain unused remnant lands to the Board of County Commissioners of Caddo County, Okla., for fairground and park purposes;

H. R. 10460. An act for the relief of Mary Cornick;

H. R. 10765. An act granting a patent to George M. Van Leuven for the northeast quarter of section 18, township 17 north, range 19 east, Black Hills meridian, South Dakota;

H. R. 11705. An act to perfect the title to land belonging to the M. Forster Real Estate Co., of St. Louis, Mo.;

H. R. 12463. An act to authorize the withdrawal of lands on the Quinaielt Reservation, in the State of Washington, for lighthouse purposes;

H. R. 12844. An act for the relief of Spencer Roberts, a member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia;

H. R. 13415. An act to increase the limit of cost of public building at Shelbyville, Tenn.;

H. R. 13717. An act to provide for leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods;

H. R. 13965. An act to refund to the Sparrow Gravely Tobacco Co. the sum of $176.99, the same having been erroneously paid by them to the Government of the United States;

H. R. 14404. An act for the relief of E. F. Anderson;

H. R. 14405. An act for the relief of C. F. Jackson;

H. R. 14679. An act for the relief of Clarence L. George;

H. R. 14685. An act to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department;

H. R. 16205. An act for the relief of Davis Smith;

H. R. 16431. An act to validate the homestead entry of William H. Miller;

H. R. 16476. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the city of Susanville, in Lassen County, Cal., for certain lands, and for other purposes;

H. R. 17045. An act for the relief of William L. Wallis;

H. R. 18202. An act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes;

H. J. Res. 249. Joint resolution for the appointment of George Frederick Kunz as a member of the North American Indian Memorial Commission; and

H. J. Res. 295. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to return to the State of Louisiana the original ordinance of secession adopted by said State.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CHILTON. Senate bill 5574 is an act fixing the place of holding courts in West Virginia. It has come from the House with amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up at the present time, in order that the amendments may be concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5574) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, which were, on page 2, line 15, after "law," to insert: ": And provided further, That a place for holding court at Elkins shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Randolph County until other provision is made therefor by law," and, on page 3, lines 6 and 7, after "further," to strike out all down to and including line 9 and insert: "That a place for holding court at Williamson shall be furnished free of cost to the United States by Mingo County until other provision is made therefor by law."

Mr. CHILTON. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

H. R. 4651. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain land to the trustees of the charity fund of Star in the East Lodge, of Oldtown, Me., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint delegates to attend the Ninth International Congress of the World's Purity Federation, to be held in the city of San Francisco, State of California, July 18 to 24, 1915, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

H. J. Res. 246. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a revocable license for the use of lands adjoining the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair orders inserted in the RECORD a telegram from the Ohio Manufacturers' Association, protesting against the further consideration of this bill.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, August 18, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Ohio Manufacturers' Association earnestly urges that action upon the pending Clayton bill be postponed until a later session of Congress, and we do this irrespective of the possible merits of the legislation contemplated by the bill. We call your attention to the facts, doubtless well known to you, that the industry and commerce of this country have been called upon within a very brief period to meet many changes in the fundamental laws and conditions governing every phase of our transactions. The currency and tariff in themselves require drastic readjustment, while the trade-commission bill recently enacted will impose upon business new and uncertain conditions difficult to meet at a time like this. To further complicate the situation, we are now faced by a world war involving commercial problems of absolutely unique character. We do not feel that we are unreasonable in beseeching your honorable body to postpone action upon a further measure, more unsettling in character, more threatening in aspect than any which have preceded it. We submit that the passage of this measure at this time would not "relieve business of uncertainty," but would greatly add to the perplexities which now beset business men. If the Clayton bill is a wise and just measure, it will unquestionably be passed by a later Congress and loyally accepted by the business men of the country. Nothing substantial will be lost by a reasonable delay, through which, in the face of the present crisis, disaster may be avoided. Representing the second largest industry in the State of Ohio, we earnestly beseech your consideration of this appeal.

By order of the executive committee of the Ohio Manufacturers' Association.

Attest:

MALCOLM JENNINGS, Secretary.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I desire to read a few lines from the syllabus in the case of Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S., 275). I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it in connection with the argument which was just made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. He made the statement during the course of his argument that the courts held that the Sherman antitrust law in its application to interstate transactions of this character was broader than the common law. This is the syllabus, showing that view was fully sustained by the court:

The antitrust act of July 2, 1890, makes no distinction between classes. Organizations of farmers and laborers were not exempted from its operation, notwithstanding the efforts which the records of Congress show were made in that direction.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that section 7 is now before the Senate for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the last paragraph of section 6 is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was agreed to by a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am very glad to hear it, but I do not think it was done. It was not even read. The first paragraph of section 6, on page 6, was read and adopted. The second paragraph has not even been read, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary says it has been read. It was treated as one amendment, and both paragraphs have been adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON. If the record shows it, all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 12, before the word "labor," strike out the word "fraternal"; after the word "labor," strike out the word "consumers"; in line 13, after the word "organizations," strike out the words "orders, or associations"; in line 16, after the word "organizations," strike out the words "orders, or associations"; in the same line insert the word "lawfully"; and in line 18, after the word "organizations," strike out the words "orders, or associations," so as to make the first paragraph of section 7 read:

That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restrain of trade under the antitrust laws.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, section 7 in its entirety as reported by the committee reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws.

Mr. President, it is not only the right but, in my opinion, the duty of labor to organize. I have no doubt that union labor has not only been of great value and benefit to the members of the organizations, but, indirectly, of benefit to those who are not members of the organization. The unionization of labor has assisted in maintaining a higher and better wage, better conditions with reference to the place where the work was to be performed, and has generally improved the conditions of labor, not only, as I said, with reference to those who are immediately members of the organization, but, indirectly, all labor has been benefited thereby.

I do not think that anyone at this time controverts the proposition or would argue against not only the right but the duty of labor to organize, in view of the thorough organization of the business world, with which labor has to deal. The only wonder to me has been that so many remain outside of the unions. Laborers have a right to organize, as I understand it, under the law as it now exists. They have a right to organize for the purpose of protecting their wages and for the purpose of raising their wages. They have the right, either singly or collectively as an organization, to refuse to work and to go upon a strike unless the wage is satisfactory. They may, in my opinion, notwithstanding the Sherman law, combine to raise wages and to strike if those wages are not conceded, and to carry out their strike in all peaceful and lawful ways.

Incidentally to this, of course, is the right to take care of strikers, to furnish funds during a strike, to take care of the families of strikers, and to generally carry on, through any peaceful or lawful methods, the cause of securing better wages and better conditions. They may strike for any reason they see fit to assign or for no reason. They may strike through sympathy, or they may strike because of a substantial and direct injury to themselves.

Mr. President, I read this section 7 as in no wise changing the law as it now exists from what I contemplate and conceive the law to be. I understand, of course, that there are those who believe that without such a provision as this, labor organization per se pursuing their ordinary and legitimate purposes would be in danger. I do not think so. I think they may, in fact, do now all that they may do after this section becomes the law. I know that a different view is entertained not only by members of labor organizations, but by very noted and distinguished lawyers. An article was published in the eastern papers some time ago by a distinguished member of the bar, in which he said:

The mere combination of employees in a given industry in the form of an organization to secure better wages, followed by any overt act, such as the demand for a higher wage or the refusal to work unless the same is conceded, is in restraint of trade and in violation of existing law. * * * The controlling circumstance that the free flow of competition in the trade in human labor has been restrained by this agreement among the workmen not to sell their labor except upon terms agreed upon between them stamps the combination as a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

In my opinion no decision of the courts can be found to sustain that view. On the other hand, speaking with all due respect, I think the authorities lay down the very opposite view.

So far as those who view the law as there expressed by this attorney and by some who are members of labor organizations are concerned, I can see a perfectly good reason for the enactment of this statute. But I was not willing, Mr. President, for this section to be adopted by my vote or with my apparent approval without stating what I conceive to be the law now and what the law will be when this section is adopted. I think no one should be misled and I feel that it is entirely proper to make known what we do not do as well as what we propose to do. The only effect of it, in my judgment, will be to remove the possibility of an attack upon the organization as such, which in my judgment at this time could not be successfully made. In other words, it removes a fear, possibly well grounded, but in my judgment unfounded in the law as it now exists. This section gives these organizations a status and permits them to lawfully carry out their legitimate purposes.

Doubtless the impression prevails among workingmen of this country that, according to the decisions of the court, labor organizations of themselves, organized for the purpose of protecting their wage, when guilty of any overt act in raising the wage are within the prohibition of the Sherman law. If such were the law, no one would want it so; but that such is not the law I entertain no doubt. The only effect of this section, therefore, standing alone and as reported from the committee, is to set at rest the fear that these organizations per se may be attacked and dissolved under the Sherman law.

If I entertained the opinion held by some, I would not only be in favor of this law, for the reasons which I have stated, but I would be in favor of it for the reason that I do not believe there is any desire upon the part of the public nor anything to be gained upon the part of the public in destroying labor organizations in their legitimate function, in performing the purposes for which ordinarily we regard them as organized to perform.

But it is not true, Mr. President, that labor organizations guilty of an overt act in raising their wages or in demanding higher wages are now inhibited by the Sherman law, notwithstanding the view expressed by learned attorneys. I believe that labor has a perfect right under the law now to strike because wages are lower than labor desires wages to be, and demand a higher wage, even if it stops every wheel rolling between the Atlantic and Pacific.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator qualifies his statement by interjecting into it the fact that wages must be lower. I should like to know how the Senator looks at the proposition that they would have a right to stop for that reason or for any other reason, or for no reason.

Mr. BORAH. For no reason. There is no law in this country and there never has been any law established by any court that I am familiar with to the effect that a man may not quit his employer's employment for the purpose of securing a better wage, or for any other reason satisfactory to the laborer himself, whether sanitary conditions, the betterment of labor generally, or for no reason assigned whatever. You can not compel a man to work under any system that we have so long as the Constitution of the United States has the salutary provision in it that it has now.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator agree with me that under his conception of what the law is laborers would have a right to simultaneously withdraw from employment in order to coerce another employer who is having difficulty with his employees?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not go to that extent, unless it is understood that it is voluntary all along the line. If all who quit do so voluntarily, they may do so; but men who have quit can not coerce or interfere with others to make them quit.

Mr. HUGHES. Then the Senator does not think that they can simultaneously withdraw or strike for no reason; that they must have good reason.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not say that. What I say is that labor organizations may, so far as the relationship between the employer and employee is concerned, cease to work; and if that has the effect of producing nonemployment or cessation of work upon the part of the laborers elsewhere, it is an incident to it; but a labor organization can not demand that some one who is not dissatisfied with the employment at all shall not be permitted to labor.

Mr. HUGHES. But suppose this situation—I merely want to get the Senator's view—suppose there is a strike in a certain industrial establishment and another industrial establishment is furnishing raw material to the first establishment. In the Senator's view would the laborers in the second establishment, which is engaged in furnishing raw material to the industrial establishment having difficulty, be justified in going on a strike?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that if the employees of one industry and the employees of another industry agree to quit both may quit, although one of the industries is not dissatisfied; but if the employees of one industry are satisfied and the others insist and interfere with their going ahead with their employment, then a different question arises.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no question of interference at all.

Mr. BORAH. I misunderstood the Senator. It is the proposition whether or not men have a right to quit work for any reason or for no reason—yes, absolutely.

Mr. HUGHES. I want to ask the Senator's opinion of the situation set out by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. That Senator says that the present law does not in any way prevent the sudden, simultaneous cessation of employment on the part of labor. The Senator suggested the case of a strike taking place on all railroads west of Chicago. That would undoubtedly greatly inconvenience the people depending upon that line of transportation for goods, and it would amount not only to a restraint of trade to all practical purposes, but to an absolute cessation of trade between certain cities. Does not the Senator think that a situation like that, with the city of Chicago absolutely shut off from San Francisco and New York by the cause of simultaneous withdrawals from employment of the railroads of their men, it would constitute under the law as it stands a restraint of trade and commerce?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not, if the men who struck or quit work in no wise interfere with the employers in securing other labor or in no wise interfered with the operating of the trains in any other method than through themselves. I entertain no possible doubt that the employees of the railroad, the entire employment may cease to work for the railroad company at any hour they see fit.

We are not talking about instances where they are under contract to work for a certain length of time, but where the contractual relations do not appear they may cease to work for the railroad at any time they see fit. The fact that the cessation of trade occurs is an incident to the superior right of the laborer to quit work.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; but where is that superior right set out? That is what I would like to ascertain from the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I will reach that in a few moments, but it is set out in the Constitution of the United States, as will be disclosed by Judge Harlan's opinion.

Mr. HUGHES. Take this case: Suppose they had no organization, but they proceeded to form one, the avowed purpose of the organization being to cause a cessation of commerce between two States over a particular line, that being the only railroad line running between those States—and there are points in the United States to which there are no wagon roads, which are absolutely dependent upon railroad transportation as a means of commerce between the States. Now imagine the case of men combining and agreeing together that they would do certain acts, the necessary result of which would be a cessation of commerce, I can not for the life of me conceive why that would not be a restraint of commerce.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has raised there a different question entirely. In that case the men come together with the intent to restrain trade, for the purpose of preventing commerce between the States. It is a combination to restrain trade which they or no one else can do or should be permitted to do; but if restraint of trade follows from the mere fact of quitting work it is an injury for which there is no damage, and for which the men quitting work are not liable.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator a while ago agreed with me that they would have a right to quit for any reason or for no reason.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. But you are not presenting the case of quitting work; you are talking about a combination which is made to restrain trade.

Mr. HUGHES. They do not have to set out their reason, and they do not set out their reason; but they are responsible for the reasonable consequences that follow from their acts and it is admitted that the reasonable consequence of this act of theirs in simultaneously withdrawing from the common employment is going to be an absolute cessation of commerce between two points in two different States. For the life of me, as I said a while ago, I can not see why an agreement, a combination, or conspiracy to bring about that result would not be a restraint of commerce under the Sherman antitrust law, which speaks of restraints of trade and agreements and combinations to interfere with and restrain interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, as we proceed with the matter I shall be very glad to discuss it further with the Senator. I think I had better take up some of the decisions, perhaps, and get my views more thoroughly before the Senate.

Mr. President, one of the best statements of the law that has ever been made was made by Mr. Justice Harlan in a noted case, with which Senators are all, no doubt, familiar, but it is perhaps worth while to refresh our recollection in regard to it, because, with no exception, it is coming to be the recognized law with reference to this subject in this country, and I think has been pretty generally and clearly approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is true that the Sherman antitrust law itself was not the specific subject under investigation or discussion by the court at the time the opinion was rendered, but the opinion was rendered after the Sherman law was passed and relates to the employees of railroad companies, which railroad companies were operating between different States, and were, therefore, engaged in interstate commerce. I quote from the case of Arthur against Oakes in Sixty-third Federal Reporter, page 317, in which Justice Harlan said:

> But the vital question remains whether a court of equity will, under any circumstances, by injunction prevent one individual from quitting the personal service of another? An affirmative answer to this question is not, we think, justified by any authority to which our attention has been called or of which we are aware. It would be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for or to remain in the personal service of another. One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude, a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States or in any place subject to their jurisdiction. Courts of equity have sometimes sought to sustain a contract for services requiring special knowledge or peculiar skill by enjoining acts or conduct that would constitute a breach of such contract. To this class belong the cases of singers, actors, or musicians, who, after agreeing, for a valuable consideration, to give their professional service at a named place and during a specified time for the benefit of certain parties, refuse to meet their engagement and undertake to appear during the same period for the benefit of other parties at another place. (Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G., 604, 617; id., 5 De Gex & S. 485, 16 Jur., 871; Montagne v. Flockton, L. R. 16 Eq., 189.) While in such cases the singer, actor, or musician has been enjoined from appearing during the period named at a place and for parties different from those specified in his first engagement, it was never supposed that the court could by injunction compel the affirmative performance of the agreement to sing or to act or to play. In Powell Duffryn Steam-Coal Co. v. Taff Vale Ry. Co. (9 Ch. App., 331, 335) Lord Justice James observed that when what is required is not merely to restrain a party from doing an act of wrong, but to oblige him to do some continuous act involving labor and care, the court has never found its way to do this by injunction. In the same case Lord Justice Mellish stated the principle still more broadly—perhaps too broadly—when he said that a court can only order the doing of something which has to be done once for all, so that the court can see to its being done.
> The rule, we think, is without exception that equity will not compel the actual affirmative performance by an employee of merely personal services any more than it will compel an employer to retain in his personal service one who, no matter for what cause, is not acceptable to him for service of that character. The right of an employee engaged to perform personal service to quit that service rests upon the same basis as the right of his employer to discharge him from further personal service. If the quitting in the one case or the discharging in the other is in violation of the contract between the parties, the one injured by the breach has his action for damages; and a court of equity will not, indirectly or negatively, by means of an injunction restraining the violation of the contract, compel the affirmative performance from day to day or the affirmative acceptance of merely personal services. Relief of that character has always been regarded as impracticable. (Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed., 730, 740, Taft, J., and authorities cited; Fry, Spec. Perf., 3d Am. ed., 11, 87–91, and authorities cited.)

It is supposed that these principles are inapplicable or should not be applied in the case of employees of a railroad company, which, under legislative sanction, constructs and maintains a public highway primarily for the convenience of the people and in the regular operation of which the public are vitally interested. Undoubtedly the simultaneous cessation of work by any considerable number of the employees of a railroad corporation without previous notice will have an injurious effect and for a time inconvenience the public. But these evils, great as they are, and although arising in many cases from the inconsiderate conduct of employees and employers, both equally indifferent to the general welfare, are to be met and remedied by legislation restraining alike employees and employers so far as necessary adequately to guard the rights of the public as involved in the existence, maintenance, and safe management of public highways.

In the absence of legislation to the contrary, the right of one in the service of a quasi public corporation to withdraw therefrom at such time as he sees fit, and the right of the managers of such a corporation to discharge an employee from service whenever they see fit, must be deemed so far absolute that no court of equity will compel him, against his will, to remain in such service, or actually to perform the personal acts required in such employments, or compel such managers, against their will, to keep a particular employee in their service. It was competent for the receivers in this case, subject to the approval of the court, to adopt a schedule of wages or salaries, and say to employees, "We will pay according to this schedule, and if you are not willing to accept such wages you will be discharged." It was competent for an employee to say, "I will not remain in your service under that schedule, and if it is to be enforced I will withdraw, leaving you to manage the property as best you may without my assistance." In the one case, the exercise by the receivers of their right to adopt a new schedule of wages could not, at least in the case of a general employement without limit as to time, be made to depend upon considerations of hardship and inconvenience to employees. In the other, the exercise by employees of their right to quit in consequence of a proposed reduction of wages could not be made to depend upon considerations of hardship or inconvenience to those interested in the trust property or to the public. The fact that employees of railroads may quit under circumstances that would show bad faith upon their part, or a reckless disregard of their contract or of the convenience and interests of both employer and the public, does not justify a departure from the general rule that equity will not compel the actual, affirmative performance of merely personal services, or (which is the same thing) require employees, against their will, to remain in the personal service of their employer.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator, of course, knows as well as I do that that is altogether beside the question we were discussing. I never dreamed that anybody would even make application to a court of equity to compel a man specifically to perform a personal service. One of the first things which I was taught in law school was that a court of equity would not compel partners to remain together and would not compel a man to remain in employment. He might quit the employment, but he was responsible for the necessary consequences that followed from the fact that he violated his contract.

Now, admitting what Justice Harlan says to be the law, as it undoubtedly is, yet the fact remains that when these men did simultaneously cease work in the employment in which they were engaged they were still responsible for the reasonable consequences that flowed from that act.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no, Mr. President. The court says that they had the constitutional right to quit, the constitutional right to be relieved from the employment for any reason that they might have. It was not alone a question of the power of injunction, but as a fundamental, elemental, constitutional right they might quit and could be neither punished under the common law or held in damages.

Mr. HUGHES. The court, as I understand, intimates that legislation might regulate in some way the rights of those men, so far as the public were concerned. It says so in that opinion, but it does not go any further than to say that the court will not issue an injunction commanding a man to stay in a certain employment.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator say the court does not say that?

Mr. HUGHES. The court does not go further than to say that it will not issue an injunction commanding a man to stay in a certain employment and to render a certain service. It will not do that. But the court does not say that in a criminal court or in a court of law, where damages merely were sought, they would be free from responsibility.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can not conceive of a man recovering damages from another man for doing a thing which the Constitution of the United States guarantees him the right to do. That is what the court says here, that they have under the Constitution the absolute right to quit the employment of an interstate carrier. Now, suppose after quitting it had been the purpose of someone who was injured by their quitting to recover damages. The complete defense would have been their constitutional right to quit work. Or suppose an action had been brought under the Sherman law to dissolve their unions. The complete answer would have been that under the Constitution we had the right to quit, and the fact that it interfered with commerce was subordinate and incident to the absolute and perfect right under the Constitution to cease the employment. They would have said further, in answer to the charge, We have done nothing other than that which is right and legal for us to do under the Constitution. Oh, no; this case is not to be limited to the mere power to issue an injunction to prevent their quitting.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator knows that a man has a constitutional right to libel another, that the court will not enjoin him from publishing the libel, and that a jury under the Constitution must pass upon whether or not the libelous matter is true or false; but still he is liable in damages.

Mr. BORAH. Well, does the Senator think that the constitutional provision with reference to the freedom of the press and a man being responsible in damages for what he says is the same proposition as that a man can not be compelled to work in penal servitude?

Mr. HUGHES. I think it is fairly parallel.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the similarity is great.

Mr. HUGHES. In any event, the position the Senator takes—and I want to agree with him, although in supporting this legislation I can not altogether agree with him, for I believe the legislation is absolutely necessary—the position the Senator takes is that it was never intended by the antitrust legislation to interfere with laboring men at all, so far as their simultaneous cessation of work is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree with the Senator that such a conception never was in the mind of the author of the act. The debates clearly show that fact.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt the framers of the law never intended that the cessation of work upon the part of labor unions should constitute such a restraint of trade as would render laborers liable under the Sherman law; but there are conditions under which they would be liable under the Sherman law, which we will discuss later. The cessation of work, however, is not one of those conditions.

The judge says further here:

> It was equally their right, without reference to the effect upon the property or upon the operation of the road—

This comes pretty close to the question of damages, as the distinguished Senator will observe—

> It was equally their right, without reference to the effect upon the property or upon the operation of the road, to confer with each other upon the subject of the proposed reduction in wages and to withdraw in a body from the service of the receivers because of the proposed change. Indeed, their right, as a body of employees affected by the proposed reduction of wages, to demand given rates of compensation as a condition of their remaining in the service, was as absolute and perfect as was the right of the receivers, representing the aggregation of persons, creditors, and stockholders interested in the trust property, and the general public, to fix the rates they were willing to pay their respective employees.

There can be no question as to the purport and the far-reaching effect of that statement. They had a perfect and complete right to quit singly or as a body, regardless of the effect upon the public or the injury which it might be to property.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course I maintain that all that decision sets out is that the court would not enjoin them to the contrary.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator's position.

Mr. President, I call attention next to the case of Hopkins v. The United States (171 U. S., 593). This was an action under the Sherman antitrust law. The decision, of course, is not dealing with a labor organization or labor union, but it lays down the proposition that the restraint of interstate commerce must not be merely incidental to some other acts which the party has a right to perform, but must be substantial and direct before it comes within the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, and it cites the particular kind of cases with which we are dealing as an illustration of the view of the courts. The court says:

> It is not difficult to imagine agreements of the character above indicated. For example, cattle, when transported long distances by rail, require rest, food, and water. To give them these accommodations it is necessary to take them from the car and put them in pens or other places for their safe reception. Would an agreement among the landowners along the line not to lease their lands for less than a certain sum be a contract within the statute as being in restraint of interstate trade or commerce? Would it be such a contract even if the lands, or some of them, were necessary for use in furnishing the cattle with suitable accommodations? Would an agreement between the dealers in corn at some station along the line of the road not to sell it below a certain price be covered by the act because the cattle must have corn for food? Or would an agreement among the men not to perform the service of watering the cattle for less than a certain compensation come within the restriction of the statute? Suppose the railroad company which transports the cattle itself furnishes the facilities, and that its charges for transportation are enhanced because of an agreement among the landowners along the line not to lease their lands to the company for such purposes for less than a named sum, could it be successfully contended that the agreement of the landowners among themselves would be a violation of the act as being in restraint of interstate trade or commerce? Would an agreement between builders of cattle cars not to build them under a certain price be void because the effect might be to increase the price of transportation of cattle between the States? Would an agreement among dealers in horse blankets not to sell them for less than a certain price be open to the charge of a violation of the act, because horse blankets are necessary to put on horses to be sent long journeys by rail, and by reason of the agreement the expense of sending the horses from one State to another for a market might be thereby enhanced?

Would an agreement among cattle drivers not to drive the cattle after their arrival at the railroad depot at their place of destination to the cattle yards where sold, for less than a minimum sum, come within the statute? Would an agreement among themselves by locomotive engineers, firemen, or trainmen engaged in the service of an interstate railroad not to work for less than a certain named compensation be illegal because the cost of transporting interstate freight would be thereby enhanced? Agreements similar to these might be indefinitely suggested.

In our opinion all these queries should be answered in the negative.

I entertain no doubt, Mr. President, but that the employees, the engineers, the firemen, and the brakemen could all agree to quit work, and to quit work at any time they saw fit, leaving out for the present the discussion of a contractual relation running for a certain time, notwithstanding the fact that it might prevent the operation of the train and thereby actually stop commerce, because it is an incident to their superior right, to their perfect and complete right under the Constitution, to quit work whenever they see fit to do so. The correlative proposition would be that it would be within the power of the courts or in the power of the law to compel these men to remain in the employ of the company until such time as in the judgment of the court it might be deemed wise for them to quit. If they can not quit work, if we have the power to prevent them from ceasing labor because incidentally it stops commerce, the other proposition must be true, that there is some power under the Constitution in the laws and in the courts to compel them to continue in the employment, which would be, in my judgment, absolutely in the teeth of the Constitution of the United States, as cited by Justice Harlan.

An agreement may in a variety of ways affect interstate commerce just as State legislation may, and yet, like it, be entirely valid, because the interference produced by the agreement or by the legislation is not direct.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I do not like to be constantly interrupting the Senator if it annoys him.

Mr. BORAH. No; not at all.

Mr. HUGHES. I simply wish to call his attention to the fact that the court there is dealing with an agreement which has not been acted upon, an agreement which apparently all hands have agreed to—the railroads and their employees. The court does not go so far as to say that if, in order to get that agreement, these men had committed certain overt acts, such as ceasing at once their employment, it would be as innocent as it is without those overt acts.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, the court is not dealing with any agreement.

Mr. HUGHES. The court cited, as an example of an innocent agreement which would not be violative of the law, an agreement between locomotive firemen or engineers.

Mr. BORAH. The court is using the word "agreement" there as we use it in popular parlance. The effect of the court's decision is simply that they might have an understanding or agreement or coming together, and all quit at once as the result of that agreement.

Mr HUGHES. No; I am addressing myself to the other part of the statement.

Mr. BORAH. The particular part to which I have reference is:

Would an agreement among themselves by locomotive engineers, firemen, or trainmen engaged in the service of an interestate railroad not to work for less than a certain named compensation be illegal?

Mr. HUGHES. That means, "Would a union for that purpose be illegal?" The court says: "No; a union for that purpose would not be illegal;" but the court does not say that a union would be innocent which might have not only that for its purpose but an intention to strike.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt of the proposition, which to me is an entirely different proposition, that for a union or a labor organization or laboring men to go out with the intent and for the purpose of stopping an interstate train and preventing anybody from operating such a train, thereby making it their prime object and the purpose for which they are operating and acting, would be within the Sherman law; but that is an entirely different proposition from the one I am arguing, which is that the members of a labor organization have a perfect right to stop work for any reason they want to, although the result of it is to prevent the operation of a train and to stop commerce.

Mr. HUGHES. I can not see how the Senator can reconcile those two statements. That is the way it appears to me. I do not want to be captious, but that is the way I honestly think on the subject.

We will take the case—and it is not a fanciful case, either—of a group of men who are in practically entire control of a certain branch of industry. Take the locomotive engineers: There is not any doubt in my mind that on any great railroad, if the locomotive engineers went on a strike, there would not be a sufficient number of unattached locomotive engineers outside of their organization competent and capable of filling their places, or any respectable percentage of their places; so you can easily assume a case where locomotive engineers, by going on strike, would cause an absolute cessation of commerce. Now, a while ago I asked the Senator whether those men would have a right to strike for a reason satisfactory to themselves or for no reason—for any reason or not reason at all. The Senator agreed with me then, I think.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with you now.

Mr. HUGHES. But if their purpose or reason is to cause that cessation of commerce, as the Senator said a minute ago, as I understood, they would be operating in violation of the law.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt at all of the proposition that the organized engineers, although they might be the only engineers who could run the trains properly, could quit work. They could assign a reason or not assign a reason, just as they pleased. If they went a step further, however, and if the road was prepared to operate and they interfered with its operation through the instrumentalities which the road might choose to employ, incompetent engineers or otherwise, they would be within the provisions of the Sherman law. In one instance—to wit, in quitting work—they are exercising a right; in the other instance, where they interfere with others from operating a train, they are not exercising a right, but doing a wrong, and the consequences which flow from doing a thing we have a right to do and the thing we have not a right to do may be physically the same, but the legal liability is different.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree with the Senator absolutely as to that. Of course I think they are within it now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course there never has been any decision upon all fours, as we use the term sometimes at the bar, with this proposition, but I do challenge my friends who think that there has been a different rule to cite a single case which has been sustained on appeal and has become the final voice of the court, in which the Federal courts have ever interfered with the right of the members of a labor organization to quit work whether they did it singly or collectively and whether it had the effect of stopping commerce or whether it did not. I do not believe any authority can be cited to the effect that they must continue in the employment, not according to their wishes, but according to the demands or the interests or the welfare of commerce. If any such case should be cited, I would agree perfectly with those who think there is a justification for this statute.

I understand that there are well-grounded fears on the part of honest men in regard to it, and in so far as it accomplishes the things which I believe now to exist, and which ought to be accomplished, I stand with them, and do not oppose the statute for that reason.

But, Mr. President, let me call attention to another case, and that is the case of Adair against United States, in Two hundred and eighth United States, page 178:

Manifestly, any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. But what possible legal or logical connection is there between an employee's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce? Such relation to a labor organization can not have, in itself and in the eye of the law, any bearing upon the commerce with which the employee is connected by his labor and services. Labor associations, we assume, are organized for the general purpose of improving or bettering the conditions and conserving the interests of its members as wage earners—an object entirely legitimate and to be commended rather than condemned. But surely those associations as labor organizations have nothing to do with interstate commerce as such. One who engages in the service of an interstate carrier will, it must be assumed, faithfully perform his duty, whether he be a member or not a member of a labor organization. His fitness for the position in which he labors and his diligence in the discharge of his duties can not in law or sound reason depend in any degree upon his being or not being a member of a labor organization. It can not be assumed that his fitness is assured, or his diligence increased, by such membership, or that he is less fit or less diligent because of his not being a member of such an organization.

A single paragraph, Mr. President, from the case of Gompers against The Buck's Stove & Range Co., in Two hundred and twenty-first United States, at page 439:

The law, therefore, recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized.

The case of National Protective Association against Cumming, in One hundred and seventieth New York, page 321, is a case familiar to us all, and has often been cited. Along with the opinion of Justice Harlan, it states the rights of labor unions as I conceive them to be, and as I believe the authorities will finally permanently and unmistakably establish them in this country:

It is not the duty of one man to work for another unless he has agreed to, and if he has so agreed, but for no fixed period, either may end the contract whenever he chooses. The one may work, or refuse to work, at will, and the other may hire or discharge at will. The terms of employment are subject to mutual agreement, without let or hindrance from anyone. If the terms do not suit, or the employer does not please, the right to quit is absolute, and no one may demand a reason therefor. Whatever one man may do alone he may do in combination with others, provided they have no unlawful object in view. Mere numbers do not ordinarily affect the quality of the act. Workingmen have the right to organize for the purpose of securing higher wages, shorter hours of labor, or improving their relations with their employers. They have the right to strike; that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed, provided the object is not to gratify malice or inflict injury upon others, but to secure better terms of employment for themselves.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, he will notice there that the court qualifies their right to strike. That was the point I was trying to make. The court itself there qualifies their right to strike, and insists upon their having a good reason or a reason satisfactory to the court.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no—

They have the right to strike—that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed—provided the object is not to gratify malice or inflict injury upon others——

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; but that qualifies it, nevertheless.

Mr. BORAH (reading):

But to secure better terms of employment for themselves.

Mr. HUGHES. You see how narrow that is.

Mr. BORAH. Of course if they are interfering with other people, that is another thing.

Mr. HUGHES. They necessarily interfere. If the Senator has had any experience with injunction cases——

Mr. BORAH. I have had some.

Mr. HUGHES (continuing). He will know that away down at the tail end of an injunction in a labor dispute there is a clause to this effect:

Nor shall these defendants in any other manner interfere with complainant's business.

The terrifying language with reference to coercion, intimidation, threats, battle, murder, and sudden death which is used to excuse the injunction, but which in very many cases is absolutely unjustified, is followed by this simple little clause:

Nor shall these defendants in any other manner interfere with the business of the complainant.

Now, to remain away from his employment in a great many trades is the most effective manner of interfering with his business.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator know of any instance in which a court has ever enjoined the members of a labor union from quitting work or from striking for higher wages?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I do. I do not remember the titles of the cases, but it seems to me that Judge Dayton——

Mr. BORAH. That case——

Mr. HUGHES. I am speaking now of some of the more remote activities of Judge Dayton, and not of this last case. There are one or two other West Virginia Federal judges who have done things of that kind. I do not say that the Supreme Court or any appellate court has ever upheld them, but back something like 15 or 20 years ago, according to my recollection, it was a common thing for receivers to make application to Federal judges to enjoin men from leaving their employment.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but they have never done that since Justice Harlan rendered his opinion in the Oakes case. The Dayton case does not go to the extent claimed and has been overruled besides.

Mr. HUGHES. I am quite prepared to believe that to be true.

Mr. BORAH. I have never known of an instance. I have never been able to find it.

Mr. HUGHES. But the injunctions have been issued, and the very thing has been done which the Senator says constitutional rights and human rights forbid being done. That is, the attempt was made to compel men to remain in a certain employment, to give their service, to force them into involuntary servitude, and the writ of injunction was invoked for that purpose; and that was the beginning of the movement against the writ of injunction which has culminated in the proposed legislation which now appears before us.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. My recollection is, though I may be mistaken, that Judge Taft punished an employee of a railroad that was being operated by a receiver because that employee quit work.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will investigate, he will find that that is a mistake. Judge Taft was too able a judge to have so held.

Mr. WHITE. That is my recollection.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator will find that he is in error as to that proposition. That was attempted to be done in the case of Arthur against Oakes. That was not Judge Taft's opinion; it was the opinion of Judge Woods, if I remember correctly; but, anyhow, it was not Judge Taft. But that was the portion of the injunction order which Justice Harlan struck from the decree. That is the only instance I know of; but you will find that Judge Taft did not lay down that rule.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator from Alabama must have the Phelan case in mind.

Mr. WHITE. I think that is the style of the case.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that is the style of the case or proceeding. The facts were not quite as the Senator supposes. If I remember the case correctly, Phelan was punished for disobeying the decree of the court in inciting others to violence and intimidation.

Mr. WHITE. I am glad to be corrected, but that was my recollection.

Mr. BORAH. Here is the Phelan case, and this is the language of Judge Taft. I cite from Sixty-second Federal Reporter, at page 817:

Now, it may be conceded in the outset that the employees of the receiver had the right to organize into or join a labor union which should take joint action as to their terms of employment. It is of benefit to them and to the public that laborers should unite in their common interest and for lawful purposes. They have labor to sell. If they stand together they are often able, all of them, to command better prices for their labor than when dealing singly with rich employers, because the necessities of the single employee may compel him to accept any terms offered him. The accumulation of a fund for the support of those who feel that the wages offered are below market prices is one of the legitimate objects of such an organization. They have the right to appoint officers who shall advise them as to the course to be taken by them in their relations with their employer. They may unite with other unions. The officers they appoint, or any other person to whom they choose to listen, may advise them as to the proper course to be taken by them in regard to their employment, or, if they choose to repose such authority in anyone, may order them, on pain of expulsion from their union, peaceably to leave the employ of their employer because any of the terms of their employment are unsatisfactory. It follows, therefore (to give an illustration which will be understood), that if Phelan had come to this city when the receiver reduced the wages of his employees by 10 per cent and had urged a peaceable strike, and had succeeded in maintaining one, the loss to the business of the receiver would not be ground for recovering damages, and Phelan would not have been liable for contempt even if the strike much impeded the operation of the road under the order of the court. His action in giving the advice or issuing an order based on unsatisfactory terms of employment would have been entirely lawful. But his coming here and his advice to the Southern Railroad employees, or to the employees of other roads, to quit had nothing to do with their terms of employment. They were not dissatisfied with their service or their pay. Phelan came to Cincinnati to carry out the purpose of a combination of men, and his act in inciting the employees of all Cincinnati roads to quit service was part of that combination. If the combination was unlawful then every act in pursuance of it was unlawful, and his instigation of the strike would be an unlawful wrong done by him to every railway company in the city, for which they can recover damages and for which, so far as his acts affected the Southern Railway, he is in contempt of this court.

Mr. WHITE. The cause was quitting, not inciting other men to quit.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will refer to the opinion, he will find what was decided.

Mr. WHITE. I am speaking of the opinion of the court. The court would seem to base it upon that rather than inciting them to quit.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has been some time since I read the opinion, but the case, as I remember it, involved the question of a secondary boycott against the Pullman Palace Car Co. Mr. Phelan was endeavoring to induce some employees of the railroad company to refuse to haul a train that contained a Pullman palace car.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was upon that ground that he was held guilty of a contempt of court. Of course the final outcome as to the railroad would be that if the railroad company insisted on carrying the Pullman car, then the employees of that railroad refused to longer remain in the service, so far as hauling that train was concerned. They did not quit service; they simply refused to assist in moving a train that had a Pullman car in it.

Mr. BORAH. The point was that the men wanted to stay in the service, but they refused to haul a particular car.

Mr. WHITE. They had the lawful right to do that, I understand, and Phelan was punished because he had incited men to do that which they had a lawful right to do.

Mr. BORAH. Phelan did not have a lawful right to do it.

Mr. WHITE. I say he was punished for inciting men to do that which they had a lawful right to do.

Mr. HUGHES. Whether Senators believe it is the law that men have or have not the right to strike for any reason or for no reason, what the Senator from Iowa calls the secondary boycott is not a boycott; it is what the labor men call a sympathetic strike.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand the Senator from Iowa that way at all.

Mr. HUGHES. It was precisely that.

Mr. BORAH. If a body of workingmen are working, we will say, for the Union Pacific Railroad Co., and another body of workingmen are working for the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., and if the Union Pacific Railroad Co. has trouble with its employees, there is no doubt that if out of mere sympathy the Northern Pacific employees want to quit they have a perfect right to quit. But if the Northern Pacific men are willing to continue and are satisfied with their situation, and the Union Pacific men undertake to menace by threats or violence, or otherwise to interfere with them, a different case is presented.

Mr. HUGHES. Let us leave out all that fustian about threats, intimidation, and violence; no one wants to legalize acts of that kind.

Mr. BORAH. I will try to keep fustian out of my speech.

Mr. HUGHES. I hope we will at least be able to keep it out of our colloquy so that we can get this matter cleared up. I am in sympathy with the Senator, but his position does not seem to me to be entirely clear.

I want to put this case to the Senator: The Pullman Co. has trouble with their men. They go on a strike. The strike is being carried on. There is no suggestion of violence or menace or coercion or anything of that sort so far as the Pullman employees are concerned, but they go to the employees of the railroad company which hauls certain Pullman cars and they pursuade the employees of the railroad company to a certain course of action; and as a result of what they say to them, as a result of the persuasion of the employees of the Pullman Co., the employees of the railroad company say to their employers and threaten them that they will quit, and commerce will be paralyzed unless the company refrains from hauling Pullman cars. Then, if the railroad company continues to haul the Pullman cars and its men quit, that would be a sympathetic strike; but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] calls it a "secondary boycott." I should like to know whether the Senator from Idaho thinks the employees of that railroad company had a right to do that—to go to these men under those circumstances and induce them to quit unless their employers agreed that they would not haul a Pullman car; and would the latter have the right to quit?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about it. I have no doubt that the one class of laborers or one organization may meet with another organization and discuss with them and say to them, "We do not think it is to the interest of labor that you should continue in their work." I have no doubt in the world that they may do that and they could not be restrained. I do not know of any instances where that kind of persuasion separated entirely from menace or threat or violence has ever been restrained.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not speaking about persuasion. I am speaking of the effect on the railroad employees because the railroad employees go to the president of the railroad and say certain things, which result in a threat on their part to quit, to tie up interstate commerce, although they say, "Our conditions are satisfactory; our wages are satisfactory; we are perfectly satisfied with everything surrounding us, but our brother employees are engaged in a death grapple with the Pullman Co., and you are helping the Pullman Co. to succeed by hauling their cars. If you continue to haul their cars, we will not permit you to haul your trains so far as we can prevent it."

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt they have a right to do that. I am assuming now that the men who are quitting are doing so purely through sympathy, not by reason of threats or menaces or against their own desires.

Mr. HUGHES. That is what the Senator from Iowa called a secondary boycott.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did call it a secondary boycott. It is in every sense such a boycott, although it may have been also a sympathetic strike.

But the real difficulty in the Phelan case was not that the employees of these railroads asserted the right to strike because they were hauling Pullman cars. They asserted the right to remain in the employ of the railroad company, but declined to handle any train that had in it any Pullman car.

Mr. HUGHES. And if they were compelled to handle them they would quit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not asserting any sympathy with or my concurrence in the reasoning in the Phelan case. I may be wrong about some of the facts, because I have not read it for many years, but the strikers were trying to secure redress against the Pullman Palace Car Co., and the railroad companies which were made the victims of the boycott were innocent of any offense against the strikers. It is a little difficult always to draw the line, but what I term a secondary boycott is where strikers attempt to injure an innocent man in order to work out their plan. It is exactly like the ordinary case where wage-workers go to a merchant who is dealing with the employer with whom the strikers have their dispute. They say to him: "If you do not cease to deal or have relations with the unfair employer, then we will cease to deal with you, not only with regard to the goods that may be purchased by you of the unfair employer, but as to all goods in which you deal, without regard to the source from which you get them. I think there is a striking similarity between the case of refusing to haul a train in which there was a car of an offending employer and the case of concerting and combining to withdraw patronage from a merchant who was entirely innocent of the transaction, but who may have some dealings with the unfair employer. That is the reason I call it a secondary boycott. As I remember, it is so termed in one of the opinions that involved the transaction.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me further to trespass upon his patience, I want to say that I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Iowa as to what constitutes a sympathetic strike. When you come to legislate against a secondary boycott you must legislate against a sympathetic strike, and that is the reason why I want to clear it up if I can. Men, in my opinion, have a right to strike; they have a right to institute a sympathetic strike; an unreasonable strike; or a strike for any reason or for no reason.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator that they have the right. I disagree with him in the view of the fact that he seems to think the authority they have——

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Iowa seems to think they have not the right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of their right to strike.

Mr. HUGHES. But the Senator referred to a secondary boycott.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator will remember I said I did not express any sympathy or concurrence with the reasoning of the opinion.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that. I am asking the Senator about the law. I am not trying to find out what he thinks the law ought to be.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt the law is as stated by the Senator from Idaho, that the employees have a right to strike for a good cause, or a bad cause, or for no cause at all. It is a right superior to any inconvenience that it may occasion either the employer or the public. It is a right which I think is inherent in man.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator, then, thinks that the railroad employees in the Pullman case had a right to refuse to haul the cars if the trains carried Pullman cars.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the employees of those railroads had a right to strike for any reason, but it does not follow that the acts of Phelan were justifiable under the law.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will yield to me for just a moment, whether that be the basis of Judge Taft's decision or not, I thought I could not be mistaken in regard to some of the facts in the Phelan case, namely, those relating to violence and intimidation and his activities in inciting men thereto. I have the case before me. The court says:

> We come now to consider the question of fact, whether Phelan in any of his speeches advised intimidation, threats, or violence in carrying out the boycott.

The court calls it a boycott, not a secondary boycott.

Mr. CUMMINS. I remember there was a boycott, and in the very nature of things I thought it was a secondary boycott.

Mr. STERLING (reading):

He is charged with having said, on Thursday night, June 28, at the meeting at West End Turner Hall, that the strike was then declared on; that it was the duty of every A. R. U. man to quit work, to induce and coax other men to go out, and if this was not successful to take a club and knock them out.

And much more to the same effect. If the Senator from Idaho will excuse me a moment further, I will read briefly from the court's opinion, and then Senators may judge upon what ground the court bases the decision made.

But the combination was unlawful without respect to the contract feature. It was a boycott. The employees of the railway companies had no grievance against their employers. Handling and hauling Pullman cars did not render their services any more burdensome. They had no complaints against the use of Pullman cars as cars. They came into no natural relation with Pullman in handling the cars. He paid them no wages. He did not regulate their hours, or in any way determine their services. Simply to injure him in his business, they were incited and encouraged to compel the railway companies to withdraw custom from him by threats of quitting their service, and actually quitting their service. This inflicted an injury on the companies that was very great, and it was unlawful, because it was without lawful excuse. All the employees had the right to quit their employment, but they had no right to combine to quit in order thereby to compel their employer to withdraw from a mutually profitable relation with a third person for the purpose of injuring that third person, when the relation thus sought to be broken had no effect whatever on the character or reward of their service.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, coming back to the point from which I was diverted. I was reading from the case of the National Protective Association against Cumming, which opinion was written by Chief Justice Parker:

A peaceable and orderly strike, not to harm others, but to improve their own condition, is not in violation of law.

* * * * * * *

The same rule applies to a body of men who, having organized for purposes deemed beneficial to themselves, refuse to work. Their reasons may seem inadequate to others, but if it seems to be in their interest as members of an organization to refuse longer to work, it is their legal right to stop. The reason may no more be demanded as a right of the organization than of an individual, but if they elect to state the reason their right to stop work is not cut off because the reason seems inadequate or selfish to the employer or to organized society. And if the conduct of the members of an organization is legal in itself, it does not become illegal because the organization directs one of its members to state the reason for its conduct.

The principles quoted above recognize the legal right of members of an organization to strike—that is, to cease working in a body by prearrangement until a grievance is redressed—and they enumerate some things that may be treated as the subject of a grievance, namely, the desire to obtain higher wages, shorter hours of labor, or improved relations with their employers, but this enumeration does not, I take it, purport to cover all the grounds which will lawfully justify members of an organization refusing, in a body and by prearrangement, to work. The enumeration is illustrative rather than comprehensive, for the object of such an organization is to benefit all its members and it is their right to strike, if need be, in order to secure any lawful benefit to the several members of the organization as, for instance, to secure the reemployment of a member they regard as having been improperly discharged, and to secure from an employer of a number of them employment for other members of their organization who may be out of employment, although the effect will be to cause the discharge of other employees who are not members.

And whenever the courts can see that a refusal of members of an organization to work with nonmembers may be in the interest of the several members, it will not assume, in the absence of a finding to the contrary, that the object of such refusal was solely to gratify malice and to inflict injury upon such nonmembers.

I now read a paragraph from the New Jersey Equity Reports, volume 63, page 759. It states the principle in a very clear and concise but comprehensive way:

From an examination of the cases and a very careful consideration of the subject I am unable to discover any right in the courts, as the law now stands, to interfere with this absolute freedom on the part of the employer to employ whom he will, and to cease to employ whom he will; and the corresponding freedom on the part of the workman, for any reason or no reason, to say that he will no longer be employed; and the further right of the workmen, of their own free will, to combine and meet as one party, as a unit, the employer, who, on the other side of the transaction, appears as a unit before them. * * * Union workmen who inform their employer that they will strike if he refuses to discharge all nonunion workmen in his employ are acting within their absolute right, and, in fact, are merely dictating the terms upon which they will be employed.

Now, Mr. President, I might cite many other decisions to the same effect, but these suffice. Whatever divergence may be found, if any, from principles here announced, these cases disclose the unmistakable trend of opinion and the law as it is and as it is to be. These decisions show the true attitude of the courts toward labor. In brief, what do these authorities hold? They hold the right of laborers singly or collectively, for good reason or no reason, to quit work, and that this right is absolute and guaranteed and protected by the Constitution. That the fact that the employees quitting work are in the employ of an interstate carrier and that interstate commerce is thereby interfered with does not change the rule or modify the right. That the fact that interstate commerce must suffer, and the public be inconvenienced, must all yield to the superior and protected right of the laborer to be free to do as he will with his labor. In other words, they clearly recognize the distinction between a commodity and labor. No combination would have a right to combine and to withhold the products of commerce through an intention of enforcing higher prices. It is further clearly held that the reasons for quitting work are reasons to be assigned by labor itself. The reasons may seem to be to the public wholly insufficient, but neither the public nor the courts can judge of the sufficiency of the reasons so long as the laborer in quitting acts upon his own volition, according to his own wishes, and not by reason of menace or fear of violence. It further appears clearly from these authorities that the courts have recognized that the combinations of laboring men to secure wages and refusal to work, though interfering with interstate commerce in a most pronounced way, are not within the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law; that the interference of interstate commerce is incidental, indirect, and subordinate to the positive and constitutional right of the laborer to work or not to work as he chooses. Moreover, it clearly appears from these authorities that the courts have universally commended and encouraged laborers to organize. It seems to me that these cases clearly establish these principles. In other words labor organizations may exist now and may demand higher wages and may refuse to work unless they get the wages, and that by so doing are not subject to the Sherman antitrust law. They may carry out all the legitimate objects of labor unions in a lawful way. If any decisions can be found to the contrary they were most erroneously decided. I have seen no such decisions and none are here presented.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask the Senator from Idaho if it would be agreeable to him to continue his remarks to-morrow. If so, I would prefer a request for a meeting to-night, at the suggestion of several Senators. If agreeable to the Senator, I will prefer it now.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator desire to move an adjournment?

Mr. BRYAN. I was going to ask unanimous consent to hold a session to-night.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I shall close my remarks in 20 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the Senator will understand that I did not mean to take him off the floor or to suggest that he curtail his remarks.

Mr. BORAH. I shall close my remarks in a very few minutes.

Mr. President, I have taken this much time of the Senate apparently without any justification, for I am not going to oppose this section; but I was not willing to support the section with the construction which has been placed upon it by some others who have discussed it, both in this Chamber and elsewhere.

Mr. President, I secured my intimate acquaintance with labor organizations in a manner which was not calculated to unduly prejudice me in their behalf. There were conditions which brought me in touch with labor organizations which I do not propose to discuss here, but which were certainly not calculated to lead me into a fulsome eulogy or bias me unduly in favor of such organizations. But even in these same controversies I learned to sympathize thoroughly with the rights of labor organizations and became thoroughly convinced that it was impossible for labor to deal with the great organized business interests of the world without thorough organizations of their own. My sympathies were thoroughly aroused in favor of a just, proper, and lawfully conducted organization, and I have never changed my view upon that question. I saw very clearly how it was absolutely impossible for laborers to protect their wage, to protect their conditions of employment, and to secure for themselves their fair proportion of the world's pleasures and comforts without thorough organization.

I am in favor of any measure which is deemed essential to protect and shield fully labor unions as such from the condemnation of the Sherman antitrust law or any other law. I do not believe that unions are now condemned by that law or in anywise prohibited. I do not believe that any well-considered decision of the court can be found to that effect. But if there is fear that such decision may be had, or if there is belief that any court has assumed to go thus far and to say that the organization of labor unions is of itself a restraint of trade, then this legislation is justified to that extent and I cordially support it to that extent. The time has long since passed when any right-thinking man would do other than encourage labor unions in all legitimate and lawful acts. They are essential to enable labor to protect the laborer in his wage and to help the well-being of his family. It seems to me incredible that any court would say such unions were in violation of the antitrust law. It would be a distinct and notorious perversion of the law.

These unions are no more in violation of the law than a corporation or association of business men are in themselves a violation of the law. Whether they come under the condemnation of the law depends not upon the fact as to the union, but entirely upon what as unions they do. They may combine, they may do all those things which look to the betterment and the welfare of the members, they may determine upon a wage, they may demand an increase of wage, and they may quit work singly or collectively in order to enforce their demands. All these and similar acts are not in violation of law and should not be, for they are essentially right and proper. They are within the legitimate scope and design and purpose of labor unions. But, Mr. President, we are asked by some to declare that the labor unions may go further and affirmatively and effectively and with design interfere with or restrain interstate commerce; that while we condemn all other interests and punish if they restrain trade or monopolize interstate commerce, we will except labor unions. This, Mr. President, I can not do. I could not support such a measure as a citizen or a Senator, and if I were a laboring man I am convinced I would not ask it. I do not believe that as a body labor does ask it.

Why did we pass the law of 1890; why do we keep it on the statute books? Because we thought then and think now that to restrain or embarrass interstate commerce wrongs and injures the whole people; that it works evil to the entire body politic. We thought then and we think now that to restrain or monopolize interstate trade would injure labor, and that in the end labor would suffer with all the rest of us. Now, the injury which would flow to the public from stopping commerce would be just the same regardless of who stopped it. If divine interposition through a war of the elements should stop interstate commerce, the great loss to the whole country would be just the same as if it were interfered with by some great monopoly. Labor can not thrive and the laboring man can not find work unless commerce moves, and I have no fear that labor will not see that this is true upon reflection. There are people in this country—and I am one of them—who believe very earnestly in the principle of the Sherman antitrust law. They believe that it is vital to our national welfare. So believing I could not for a moment weaken it and in the end destroy it by relieving a portion of our people from its operation while insisting upon its drastic enforcement as to others. That is not the kind of a government we built.

Neither do I believe the farmers of this country are asking to be relieved from the operation of any law deemed to be of general benefit to the people of the country. It is not like the farmer to ask any such exceptions in his favor. He knows this law of 1890 declared for a great, essential, and indispensable principle of trade and commerce, to wit, the free flow of commerce through the channels of interstate trade. He knows it declared that such commerce should be forever and at all times unembarrassed, unvexed by the restraint of monopoly. He knows there is no rule of more concern to the people as a whole, from a business and economic standpoint, than the rule declared by the statute of 1890, known as the Sherman antitrust law. He knows when our commerce is embarrassed, hindered, or restrained through combinations by reason of unnatural causes or through monopolies, when it is disturbed in any improper and illegal way, industrial stagnation, business distress, lower prices, lower wages, lockouts, and general unrest must inevitably follow.

The farmers, in my judgment, are willing and anxious to abide by this law. They are desirous of seeing it enforced fully and completely. Nothing could serve them more advantageously than the thorough enforcement of this law. What they are asking is that it be enforced alike as to all and that there be no exceptions, either by law or other political favoritism. If there is anyone in the country that is opposed to all forms of monopoly, it is the farmer. If there is anyone in favor of equality before the law, it is the farmer, and he will be the last man, in my judgment, to ask any exception or special privilege.

No, Mr. President; give the agricultural interests equality, an equal chance with other industries, and they will thrive and be content. Give the farmer an equal chance under the tariff laws with the manufacturer. Give him a system of rural credits by which he can utilize his credits and secure his loans for a reasonable rate of interest. Help him to build and construct good roads and be assured he will ask no favor of that kind; he will neither need it nor want it. Do not insult his intelligence or impeach his good citizenship and his patriotism by offering him some little special privilege or favor which will not greatly benefit him if at all and will greatly injure the country. Do not hope to secure his approval by withholding great and essential things which he should have and giving him the unfair and unessential things which he ought not to have and does not want.

Mr. President, I represent in part upon this floor a constituency made up very largely of farmers and laboring men. They constitute not only the great voting strength of the State, but in a large measure its wealth and moral force. We have but few manufacturing establishments and but few of those combinations such as it is said ought to come particularly and alone within the inhibition of this trust law. If a measure were proposed here which would have the effect of relieving the farmer and the laborer wholly from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law and I should vote for the same because they constitute largely my constituency, I would feel myself forever estopped from inveighing against the constitnency of my colleagues engaged, as they are, in a different kind of business. Yes; I would feel myself a shuffling coward and wholly unworthy of my constituency.

If there is anybody in this world that ought to stand firm and unbroken for the enforcement of all laws which restrain trade and foster monopoly, it is the farmer and the laborer. If there is any power which seems to rise above the law and above apparently any ingenuity which the law can invoke to control the price of farm products and to oppress labor, to enforce child employment, and curtail and curb prices, it is these vast monopolies, which the Sherman law is designed to destroy and which it will destroy if we ever find men with courage enough to enforce it. So far as I am concerned, I do not propose at any time to do anything which in my judgment will weaken either legally or morally our capacity to destroy monopolies in this country. We may all have to make some sacrifices, but whatever sacrifices are necessary to be made should be made without hesitation to accomplish this great end. If we begin to tear down the Sherman law in one instance to relieve its operations in certain directions, it will not be long until it will be torn down in another instance and until the principle will be wholly emasculated, the Sherman law finally repealed or made a dead letter, and the great monopolies of this country will reign supreme over the farmer and the laborer, the consumer, and all who are not within the circle of their favors. When we come to the conclusion that monopoly in this country is a good thing, let us repeal the law as a whole and venture, if we dare, upon that era of industrial autocracy. If we do not believe in such an era, let us stand firm and make whatever sacrifices necessary to its absolute destruction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the amendment, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To strike out the word "fraternal" in line 12. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was trying to get the attention of the Chair; and I suppose the matter is still open to debate, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; if there is any objection to the word "fraternal" going out.

Mr. REED. If that is the only change proposed, I do not desire to discuss it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only word proposed to be stricken out. The amendment is agreed to. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, page 7, line 12, after the word "labor," it is proposed to strike out the word "consumers," so as to read:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] is going to prefer a request, and if that is his intention, I hope he will do so before we proceed with this section.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 178) granting authority to the American Red Cross to charter a ship or ships of foreign register for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of that society.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1698) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto," asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. HULL, and Mr. MOORE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented memorials of sundry citizens of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the passage of the Clayton antitrust bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Grace Methodist Episcopal Sunday School, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide Federal censorship of motion pictures, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' Exchange of Oakland, Cal., praying for the passage of the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Youngstown, Massillon, and Alliance, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Employers' Association of Dayton, Ohio, and a petition of the Business Men's Club of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the postponement of all antitrust legislation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Allied Printing Trades Council of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the Government letting a contract for the printing of corner cards on stamped envelopes, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 6335) granting a pension to John F. Grayum (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 6336) granting an increase of pension to Joseph L. Hayes (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6337) granting an increase of pension to Sarah E. Squires; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 6338) granting an increase of pension to Sarah E. Stoddard (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries and requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENLARGED HOMESTEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1698) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECESS.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night for the purpose of considering Calendar No. 298, being House bill 8846, and, if there be sufficient time following that measure, to consider Order of Business 594, being Senate bill 6120.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I object.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is not present. I understand that, according to the terms of the pair, on this kind of a motion I may vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer, as I have heretofore done to-day, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I am requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. SHAFROTH (when the name of Mr. THOMAS was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I will inquire whether that Senator has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I withdraw my vote under those circumstances.

Mr. GORE. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of sickness.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business, and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the affirmative). A moment ago I transferred my pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I understand that since then he has come into the Chamber and voted. I therefore withdraw my previous announcement. I have, however, an agreement whereby I am permitted to vote in case it is necessary to make a quorum, and if it should turn out that there is no quorum I shall ask that my vote stand.

The result was—yeas 36, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bankhead	Hollis	Perkins	Stone
Brady	Hughes	Pittman	Swanson
Bryan	James	Reed	Thompson
Camden	Jones	Shafroth	Thornton
Chilton	Kern	Sheppard	Tillman
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Shively	Vardaman
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Simmons	Walsh
Gore	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.	White
Hitchcock	Overman	Smoot	Williams

NAYS—12.

Bristow	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Pomerene
Burleigh	Kenyon	Norris	Sterling
Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Poindexter	Weeks

NOT VOTING—48.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Nelson	Shields
Borah	Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Goff	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Burton	Gronna	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Catron	Johnson	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	La Follette	Page	Stephenson
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Penrose	Sutherland
Colt	Lewis	Ransdell	Thomas
Crawford	Lodge	Robinson	Townsend
Dillingham	McCumber	Root	Warren
du Pont	McLean	Saulsbury	West
Fall	Myers	Sherman	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion to take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., the yeas are 36, the nays are 12. Senators GALLINGER, GRONNA, and BRANDEGEE being in the Chamber and not voting but constituting a quorum with those who have voted, the Chair declares the Senate in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for myself I want to dissent from the right of the Chair to count me to make a quorum.

The Senate thereupon (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, House bill 15657, be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 6120.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator from Florida makes that request I think we ought to have a quorum. There are very few Senators here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Perkins	Thompson
Bryan	James	Reed	Vardaman
Camden	Jones	Shafroth	West
Chilton	Kenyon	Sheppard	Williams
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Smoot
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Stone
Gore	Overman	Swanson

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. THORNTON answered to his name when called.

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a recollection that there is a standing order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators, which has been standing for a month and has never been vacated. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instruction of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. LEE of Maryland, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After some delay,

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. WHITE, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. BRADY, Mr. KERN, and Mr. WALSH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After a further delay,

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Tuesday, August 18, 1914) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 19, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 18, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God and our salvation, in whom there is no shadow of turning, make us true to ourselves and unite us as a people in the bonds of patriotism and the principles of religious truth; keep us free from entangling alliances, that we may enjoy the peaceful pursuits of life, that our "virtue may be the courage of faith, our cheerfulness the patience of hope, and our life the example of charity," after the manner of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TAX UPON OPIUM AND ITS DERIVATIVES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6282, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. This bill is what is known as one of the opium bills. The House passed the bill and sent it to the Senate about a year ago.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill just read—H. R. 6282—disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a tremendous amount of protest from the physicians in my district against this bill. They feel that it is going to handicap them by requiring them to keep a record of all opiates of all kinds and classes administered by them to their patients; and, then, another class of them apparently have an idea that they will not be permitted under the terms of this bill to administer opiates, but have got to apply to a specialist for it. If there is any way of taking care of that provision so as to not everlastingly annoy the country physician, I hope the gentleman will look after it in conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not expect to be on the conference on the bill myself; I have not time to do it; but I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that there is nothing that I know of in the bill that requires the employment of a specialist. The Senate amended the bill by not requiring the doctors to make a record of the cases.

Mr. COX. Is that what is called the Nelson amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. That would go to conference. On the other hand, the people who are anxious to suppress the opium traffic are very anxious to have this Senate amendment disagreed to, but it is a question in controversy. My request would only send the bill to conference.

Mr. COX. I am very much in accord with the whole tenor of the bill, and I have argued it out with quite a number of my physicians; but they come back to me with all kinds of statements and stories to the effect that it will practically ruin a country physician, a man who lives out in the country, as an illustration, and say, in addition to that, it will give the pharmacist in the towns and in the cities the right and power to mix up all opiates, and they will afterwards be debarred from all that practice. My only purpose in rising was to say that I hope that when the bill comes out of conference it will be so framed as to literally, if possible, suppress the traffic, but at the same time protect, as far as possible, the country practitioner.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That issue will go to the conference, and I am not able to give an opinion at this time as to whether the latitude can be given that is warranted in the Senate amendment and at the same time protect the people against the traffic in opium. But that is a matter that the conferees will have to work out.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that I have received some telegrams from druggists since the Senate amended this bill, very seriously objecting to the Senate amendments. They feel that the bill as amended will not restrict the sale of opium as it was intended to do by permitting physicians to make use of this drug as they will be allowed to do under the provisions of this bill. They feel that the bill as it is now written and amended by the Senate imposes upon them certain requirements, and at the same time gives physicians certain privileges that physicians should not have if the business is to be stopped.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the real point in controversy. There are a number of other amendments to the bill, but that is the most important one. That will go to conference for the conferees to work out under this request of mine.

Mr. ADAIR. But the bill, as I understand it, did provide that physicians and operating surgeons prescribing opium should keep a record showing when it was prescribed and to whom it was prescribed, so that the record would be open to inspection by the inspectors of the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The original bill did, but I understand the Senate amendment has modified that.

Mr. ADAIR. I think that is what the druggists are objecting to. They say it is modified in such a way that the dope fiend can obtain it through physicians in the future, as they have done in the past.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That will go to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. HULL, and Mr. MOORE.

SILETZ INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yesterday, just before adjournment, the House was considering the bill (H. R. 15803) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the sale of certain lands belonging to the Indians on the Siletz Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon," approved May 13, 1910. The bill had been considered in Committee of the Whole and had been reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment. The previous question had been moved on the bill and amendment to final passage, and the vote taken on the previous question, and point of order made that no quorum was present. The RECORD reads as follows:

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 7.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The parliamentary inquiry is this: Is that bill now the unfinished business for to-day?

The SPEAKER. It would have been if the previous question had been ordered upon it, which was not done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman did not finish reading the RECORD. I immediately made the point of order that there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It goes over until two weeks from Monday.

Mr. MANN. The next unanimous-consent day.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 178. Joint resolution granting authority to the American Red Cross to charter a ship or ships of foreign register for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of that society.

SECOND HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up H. R. 1657 from the Speaker's table, and to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to call up a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH.

ENLARGED HOMESTEADS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Speaker's table H. R. 1698, and to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 1698) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for enlarged homesteads," and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. FRENCH.

THE WAR IN EUROPE.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago one of my friends called my attention to an editorial, clipped from a New York paper, which impressed me as containing such pertinent and wise observations that I have determined that it will be useful to print it in the RECORD. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A WORLD IN LIQUIDATION.

There should be little need to seek abstruse reasons for the world war, precipitated by the German militarist party with the Emperor at its head. He was probably never more sane in his life. But his over-armed country, like other countries of Europe, but in a more acute degree, was in the position of the great dry goods house which recently failed. Armament expansion could not go on, and it could not stop.

For such a situation the only possible liquidation was war. No one can believe that the initial quarrel, deliberately picked with Servia by Austria, could possibly have occurred without the connivance of the German ruler. If war was unnecessary in this case, what shall be said of four declarations of war in 48 hours, including Belgium, of whose neutrality Germany is a guarantor?

From various parts of the country this newspaper is receiving "prayers for peace." It would be a poor newspaper sheet, indeed, which could not make its own prayer in such an emergency. But the present crisis, dreadful as it is, still represents the only possible cure for a disease which has been affecting the whole world, including ourselves, since the Franco-German War of 1870.

There is just one cure, and if it were possible for some all-powerful autocrat to decree peace at this moment, the uneradicated seeds of mischief would still be there. Another world war would be merely a question of a few months. In no callous or cynical spirit it is said here and now that bleeding is the only cure for a disease which was hurrying the people of the earth into bankruptcy and barbarism.

It is entirely possible that the war may be mercifully short. Whatever the steps taken may be, the banks of Europe, and especially those of Germany, will have suspended payment in a few days. Germany has cut off the Russian supply of grain to her people. She can not depend upon getting supplies of food, with any certainty or regularity, from this country or Argentina, and least of all from Australia. She can not feed her 60,000,000 people, largely industrial, without such assistance. Her one desperate hope is that she may make some such whirlwind 30-day campaign of victory as Frederick the Great made a century and a half ago.

This is her one remote chance, and if she wins, victory may be indistinguishable from defeat, in its effect upon her neighbors and customers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the opening paragraph of that editorial is my text for the few brief remarks I shall submit. I may say in this connection that it is not my purpose to harshly criticize any one Government or ruler. My criticism is directed at a policy—a policy of crime and disaster, as I view it—common to all of them, and from which, I may say in passing, we are not entirely exempt.

The editor is right. There is no need to seek for abstruse reasons for the almost world-wide war recently begun in Europe, which grew out of a relatively unimportant quarrel between Austria and Servia. The reason is so plainly seen that he who runs may read. It is clearly the result of excessive armament, and it forever disposes of the argument that great preparedness for war is the way to insure peace. The war of all Europe shows that it has precisely the reverse influence, as some of us have contended all along.

The advocates of peace through arbitration have expected and have met the sneer that their work has been in vain. But these scorners overlook the fact that there has been no general agreement to arbitrate international disputes. The plan of reason has had no trial. These advocates of the policy of suspicion, hatred, discord, and blood have never had any sympathy with the effort to substitute reason for force in the adjustment of quarrels between States. It does not suit their purposes.

This opposition has come from people who really seem to believe that the only way to keep the peace is to have the whole world ready to fight, from some who hope to gain promotion, high rank, and fortune through war, and from commercial interests which make great earnings in the traffic in war material. The last is by far the more important and influential class. It controls newspapers and magazines, parliaments, and rulers.

The one plea in justification of a policy which is piling high the burdens of the people has been this now thoroughly discredited and exploded argument that what was paid out for excessive armaments was merely a premium on insurance against war. The world has already paid out so much in these premiums that it is bankrupt, and the war has come after all.

In all its horrible nakedness the argument now stands exposed. Will the people and their representatives ever again be deceived by these bloody fallacies? I hope not, and I am inclined to believe they will not.

In Germany, France, England, and Austria thousands of good men and women have protested and are now protesting against this "greatest crime of the ages," as Gen. Miles has called the war in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, the peace movement has not been in vain. It has made the people think. Millions now see and understand the danger of being overarmed where only thousands saw it before.

A crack-brained boy assassin in Servia killed a man and woman, and straightway kings and emperors seized on the incident as an occasion for redefining territorial boundaries and ordered thousands, it may be hundreds of thousands, of other men to their deaths. Nothing could be less logical or more cruel. The boy assassin is forgotten. His crime served as a pretext for the ambitious monarchs, and he has gone to oblivion. Meantime Europe is a slaughterhouse and the plains of Belgium are soaked with blood.

Germany, France, England, and Austria, centers of learning, art, and industry, are in a death grapple. Who will gain? Our former President, Mr. Taft, answers that question when he says that "the immense waste of life and treasure in a modern war make the loss to the conqueror only less, if it be less, than the loss of the conquered."

Already we feel the burden of this unparalleled war here in the United States. The South has paid a heavy toll in the reduced price of its greatest staple, cotton. Private property at sea under the flag of an enemy is still captured and appropriated in prize proceedings, which is only another way of saying that piracy survives among the so-called civilized and Christian nations.

The interruption of commerce and suspension of traffic on the high seas means inconvenience and suffering for all the people, whether at war or peace. Quick communication and interwoven interests make it more important now than ever in history that peace shall be preserved if all are not to suffer, innocent and guilty alike, if not in the same degree.

The press reflects the people, and newspapers are saying that if there had been no excessive armaments there would have been no war. The great preparedness compelled it, and, in the language of the editorial which the Clerk read, "for such a situation the only possible liquidation was war."

That, sir, is the lesson of the greatest crime of the ages.

War lords have much to answer for, and I hope full settlement will be exacted, even if it takes thrones and dynasties to pay the bill. Workingmen are more useful to the world than kings, and the wrong men are dying. [Applause.]

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I ask unanimous consent to address this House for about 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state the subject?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had a spectacle here that may do credit to the educated man, the great leader of the minority, rising from his feet and resorting to tactics that he has many times resorted to, claiming that he made a motion for the purpose of debate, and so stating, but when the opportunity came to him, and he got possession of the floor and the subject matter, he was silent and said not a word. Now, the secret of it was this: We were considering under the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and by the Speaker the question was stated, "Is there objection to the present consideration?" Time after time periods of half an hour were used, and sometimes objection, but no consideration except gentlemen listening to themselves. Now, when the matter of the post office at Plymouth, Mass., came up, a simple matter, the report showed that it involved the expenditure of $2,000 more; that was all. Not a member of the committee who reported the bill was present, and the gentleman in whose district the post office was located [Mr. THACHER] went over in the center and addressed himself to the leader of the minority, and that, too, was a spectacle. He was trying to enlighten the gentleman who had reserved the right to object.

The distinguished leader of the minority turned his head to one side, refused to be enlightened, and seemed to be bored by the gentleman's remarks. After that had been going on about 10 minutes I rose from my seat and addressed the Speaker and said, "Mr. Speaker, regular order." Well, the dignified gentleman who represents an Illinois district objected, as he often does, and quietly shifted to the Member from Connecticut the blame for the bill being shunted off the calendar. Well, the unsophisticated Member from Massachusetts swallowed the medicine, so to speak, and came over to me and begged me to withdraw. I had not made any objection. But here is the picture: A few moments afterwards an Indian bill came up, relating, my God, to a class of people who have been slaughtered and ruined always by the people of this country from the beginning to the present day, and this attitude was not neglected yesterday. That bill was introduced by one of his associates on his side of the House. Another simple matter. The question in the bill was, Shall the money from the sale of these lands be distributed pro rata amongst the Indians, or shall it be by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior? Well, the distinguished character reserved the right to object. Did he say anything on the Indian question? I refer everyone to the RECORD. Not a word. After those tactics had been progressing, I think, about 15 minutes I rose from my seat and addressed the Chair, "Mr. Speaker, regular order." Here is where the Ethiopian appeared in the woodpile. It was a gentleman on his own side who was talking; and instead of saying, as he had to the Member from Massachusetts [Mr. THACHER], "On account of the gentleman from Connecticut I will object," he changed his attitude—it was one of his own kind. That is the art of the man, the shrewdness of him; and we are told that shrewdness is a lower order of brain. [Laughter.] What did he do? If there is anything that rankles in the breast of the minority leader it is to put him in a position where his tongue must be stilled to silence, and it had to be stilled to silence in that parliamentary proceeding, but he rose to the occasion. He said: "I move, Mr. Speaker, that we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where we can get a chance to debate this bill."

Let us see how he debated that Indian bill. The question was whether there should be a division pro rata amongst the Indians or whether it should be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. Here is the way our distinguished gentleman debated the bill—intelligent treatment, too, it was; just listen to it.

The subject of his remarks was that it does not do to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery, or whether it was wise for a monkey to do it. [Laughter.] That was the great leader's intelligent discussion of the Indian bill. It was what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] would call "chewing the rag." There was not a word said in regard to the Indian bill.

After making that point, and after getting the House into Committee of the Whole House, with a new presiding officer in the chair, he rose in his might and suggested to the Chairman that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Now, that was a momentous affair, because the bill was only seven or eight lines in length, and it took about that number of lines for the Chairman to repeat the statement of the gentleman from Illinois and have it acted upon. So that was a great saving of time. Then the point of order was made by myself of no quorum. The quorum came in, and the gentleman felicitated himself on the large number that were present. Then he went back to the monkey-wrench story and dropped into his seat, and that was all of his debate upon the Indian bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the point of order was made of no quorum, and Members came in here with an air of saying, "Who is it that made the point of no quorum?" One is somewhat in doubt where Congress meets. Not infrequently men may think that it meets in this Hall; but by the air that some Members put on it seems that they think it ought to meet in the House Office Building. Perhaps it ought to meet across the Atlantic, where some are enjoying themselves and still drawing their salary. Perhaps some may think it ought to meet in the State of Ohio, where the enlightened Member of the House, Dr. FESS, has been instructing his scholars, and where he has spent his time, except when he comes back occasionally to dwell on the ability and honor of Fire Alarm Foraker or else abuse the President of the United States.

Gentlemen, I hold in my pocket here to-day a tabulated statement by a Member of this House showing the attendance of his associates, who are more than half of the time away. What a spectacle it is! Last Friday we had a Private Calendar day, and we practically passed two bills on the Private Calendar on account of the filibuster by the minority leader and two or three of his associates. We passed two private bills. Now, that may have been all right. The filibuster was not for the purpose of defeating those bills, for they did not oppose them, but it was to defeat bills that were not in sight, bills containing the claims of people that had lost their all in the great conflict that raged, a sort of family affair between the North and the South. All they asked was that they be sent to a court for determination. The other side has a great regard for the court, but it filibustered for fear some of these bills would pass for the courts to pass upon, and so order them to adjust the claims. They would not trust them, and the filibuster was indulged in against these poor people for asking for a day in court. They denied these poor people a hearing in the only place in the United States where they could get it. That is the ability and management of the great gentleman from Illinois of public business. Oh, for the shades of Lincoln and Conkling and Blaine! From what a height have their mantles fallen. [Applause.]

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3561. An act to appoint Frederick H. Lemly a passed assistant paymaster on the active list of the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMERICAN RED CROSS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 178.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 178) granting authority to the American Red Cross to charter a ship or ships of foreign register for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of that society.

Resolved, etc., That authority be granted to the American Red Cross, during the continuance of the present war, to charter a ship or ships of foreign register, to carry the American flag, for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of said society.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield me a little time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution in reference to the Red Cross, which recalls to all of us the present situation in the world. It seems to me that in this country at this time it is extremely important that everyone in official life, as well as those in private life, should resolve firmly that they will not be carried away with any hysterical emotion or by any partisan feeling for or against either side in this conflict abroad. [Applause.]

I believe that this is an opportunity for America which seldom or never has come before to any nation in the world. The great powers abroad are in deadly conflict. I had hoped and believed even after the war commenced that it would not really commence; but it looks now as though there would be a desperate struggle for existence by these nations engaged in war. There will be many times when complications will arise affecting our interests and our policies.

When men are engaged in a life struggle they are not careful or too particular about the interests of outsiders or about observing the ordinary courtesies or amenities laid down in advance for the control of conflicts. When these occasions arise where we are tempted to become partisan for or against, where we are tempted in order to preserve what we may call our honor to engage in the conflict, let us make up our minds now to keep our minds firm in that determination that this country shall not become under any circumstances engaged in the war on either side. [Applause.]

I believe the administration under President Wilson will be cool and calm. The danger will come when some American ship may be seized or some American interest may be affected, when people will become excited. It is the duty of all parties in this House and elsewhere, the duty of all good citizens, to stand behind the administration and make the administration feel that its duty to humanity, to civilization, and to the interests of the United States and her citizens is to keep out of the struggle [applause] and to make use of the opportunity which comes to us for our advance in civilization and power throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in harmony with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, I may say that the present situation in Europe appeals to me very keenly. From the 12th of November last until the 20th of January I sat in council daily with the representatives of all of the countries in Europe now engaged in this deadly conflict. We then had under consideration the question of greater safety of life at sea. We met as friends with a common purpose, and at that time I could not discover any of the ill will that so soon would involves Europe in war, and I recall those men, splendid types of their several nations, men of the highest citizenship, distinguished for their great service on behalf of their Governments and for humanity, and I am wondering how this titanic struggle will affect their fortunes, as well as the fortunes of the Governments they served with distinction and honor. I wish to share the sentiment of the gentleman from Illinois that we, as a nation, may not become involved in that struggle otherwise than in a humanitarian way. Let our hearts go out to them in sympathy; let us be helpful to them in every possible way. Let us alleviate the suffering and woe, the distress, and the awful consequences of war. This resolution is an expression of the Red Cross of our country for those people, and this is an effort upon their part, with our help, to equip one or more ships under the American flag to go to the relief of those who will suffer in the war, and I trust the resolution will pass without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Senate resolution will be considered as read a third time and passed.

There was no objection.

WATER POWER ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule adopted the other day the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16673, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, lines 7 and 8, by striking out the words "or those who have declared their intention to become such."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield I will ask how much time he desires?

Mr. MONDELL. Only a minute or two on this particular amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment at the end of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to close debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior may grant leases to citizens of the United States or to those who have declared their intention to become such. These leases are, in a way, perpetual, although they may be terminated at the end of 50 years. I think it is a mistake, and I am sure it is a departure from our past policy to grant anything like a long-continued and what may become a permanent interest in the public lands to those who are not citizens of the United States. We do grant those who have applied for citizenship the right to make entries of some classes, but we require that they shall become citizens of the United States before their rights permanently attach. As these rights are for a considerable period of years, and to a certain degree permanent under certain conditions, I do not believe that they ought to be enjoyed by aliens.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for section 1 which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 1 and insert the following:

"That the right of way through the public lands and national forests of the United States is hereby granted to any individual or association or corporation formed for such purpose who shall file with the Secretary of the Interior satisfactory proof of right under the laws of the State or Territory within which the right of way sought is situated, to divert and use the water of said State or Territory from the source and for the purposes proposed, for the purpose of irrigation or any other beneficial use of water, including the development of power, for the construction, maintenance, and use of water conduits, canals, ditches, aqueducts, dams, reservoirs, transmission and telephone lines, houses, buildings, and all appurtenant structures necessary to the appropriation or beneficial use of such water or the products thereof to the extent of the ground occupied thereby and 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof. Also the right to take or remove from such rights of way and lands adjacent thereto material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction and maintenance of such water conduits, canals, ditches, and other structures or works authorized under this act."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of seven minutes, five of which will be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming and two by some member of the committee, debate on this amendment and all amendments to the section close.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma to make that 10 minutes. I think I would like to have 7 minutes myself.

Mr. FERRIS. Very well. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to the section close in 10 minutes, 7 to be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming and 3 by some member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments to the section close in 10 minutes, 7 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming and 3 by the gentleman from Oklahoma or some member of the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand that if this consent is given, no debate can be had on any other amendment to the section?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the effect of it.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to offer an amendment to the section, and I would like to have 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make it 20 minutes instead of 10.

The CHAIRMAN. What is to be done with the other 10 minutes? The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto to section 1 close in 20 minutes, 7 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming and 3 by the gentleman from Oklahoma. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we have under consideration makes a very important radical departure from the past policy of the Government in the utilization of the public lands. We have heretofore granted easements over the public lands, terminable, in the case of easements for water-power purposes, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and permanent as to other classes of rights of way for water. The bill under consideration provides for a lease for a term of 50 years, and yet provides an element of perpetuity, partly by reason of the provisions of the bill and partly by reason of the fact that these water powers must be developed under perpetual water rights. I think the new plan is a mistake from every standpoint, and I have offered an amendment, the purpose of which is to provide for the rights of way for all purposes of development connected with the use of water, and I shall follow this with other amendments mostly taken from a bill which I introduced some two years ago, intended to codify all our right-of-way acts for water-development purposes. The adoption of this amendment would in no wise modify any of the provisions of the bill relative to the control of the enterprises which might be established. All possible and all necessary provisions could be made and should be made for public control of these enterprises by the proper sovereignty. But this would make the right secure, and thus in my opinion give the people who are to be served by them the very cheapest possible power, and that is the end aimed at by the legislation. There has been a great deal said here about the combinations of water powers at the present time in the United States, and the statement is made as though it followed that the enactment of this legislation would break up this monopoly in the ownership of power and prevent future concentration or further concentration. As a matter of fact, there is nothing whatever in the legislation that can affect the present concentration of ownership or interlocking interests in water power except to have the effect of more completely centralizing them, because it will leave all present water powers compared with those to be developed in the future in a most advantageous position. Furthermore, under this bill the Secretary of the Interior could grant to one corporation all of the water power, all the lands controlling water power, in all of the United States. Furthermore, there is nothing in the legislation that in its operation would tend to increase the number of units of interest in water-power development.

The logical tendency of the legislation, in my opinion, will be to concentrate water power in a few ownerships rather than to separate it into many ownerships. As a matter of fact, I am not one of those who have been as much disturbed as some have been by the statement or the allegation that the water powers of this country are in comparatively few ownerships. The statements made in some Government publications relative to the matter are, in the first place, considerably exaggerated, and, in the second place, it is not extraordinary that bankers go into the banking business, that shoemakers make shoes, that millers go into the milling business. There are comparatively few great companies in the world making machinery which is utilized for the development of water power, and it is quite natural that those few companies should take some interest in the enterprises undertaken. There are comparatively few men with an intimate knowledge of water-power development and its detail, with the knowledge essential for success. Naturally, they become interested in power enterprises. The people are not so much interested in who runs the water powers as they are in their speedy development and in saving the people's control of these enterprises and of their cheap utilization. The legislation before us, in my opinion, is not of a character to tend to the speedy development and cheap sale of power. Furthermore, I want to emphasize the fact that if there be any great evils in the present condition of water-power ownership, and if great evils would arise from the continuation or extension of that condition of ownership, there is nothing in this legislation to remedy that condition or prevent it in the future. I believe it will tend to intensify the condition complained of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I could not follow the long amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming, and neither could I follow all he said. In any event, Mr. Chairman, to offer a substitute section from another bill to the original bill under consideration would throw the entire bill and purposes of it out of joint and out of order, and I hope no considerable portion of the committee will feel there is any necessity for voting for the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1, on page 3, add the following proviso:
"Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power to regulate and adjust rates for the use of such hydroelectric power in all cases coming under Federal control."

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for eight minutes. I may not use that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for eight minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to place the regulation and control of hydroelectric power under the control of some specific body which is responsible to the public. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the most desirable for this work, as one of its duties is to supervise and regulate railroad rates. It makes a study of rates and is as well prepared to regulate the rates of business operated by hydroelectric power as it is that of business operated by steam power.

As I view this bill, and also as I viewed the Adamson dam bill, there is a lack of such provision, and I feel, Mr. Chairman, that if we pass this bill in its present form we will feel very keenly in the future the lack of having made a definite provision whereby this power can be regulated and controlled. The length of a lease is not very important if there can be an assurance of the regulation and control of the power which this bill seeks to confer. It has been contended by some that a 50-year lease ought to be given in order to encourage capital. I had felt that a less number of years would be just as great an incentive to the encouragement of capital, for it will be eagerly sought far and near. I am not so particularly interested in the number of years which the lease will run as I am in the certainty of the control of the powers granted in the lease. Mr. Chairman, nowhere in this bill is there a provision giving definite power to anyone to control rates.

In Canada the law limits the length of the lease to 20 years, and, as I recollect, a definite provision is made in the law for the regulation and control of the hydroelectric power and its use to the public. If this can be done, then the rights of the people will always be secure. If it is left uncertain, then the rights of the people will be jeopardized. You can not change the hearts of men by the enactment of law unless that law is strong enough to regulate the hearts of men. The same old heart that was greedy with the power generated by coal and wood will be just as greedy with the power generated by water. The same old heart that is greedy for dollars and cents in the business of to-day will be just as greedy in the business of the future. And it is idle to talk about men being sincere and honest and fair about incomes, because I have never seen a man who ever stopped to think of what the results would be while calculating his income. The first thing he does is to figure in dollars and cents his income. After that he may think about something else.

Why, all over this country to-day we find a spasmodic rush on the part of dealers for the purpose of enhancing their incomes, on a plea that it is necessary as a war measure. It reminds me of the old story of the Jew pricing his silks to a lady customer at about twice the usual price, and when she complained he explained: "Vell, madam, I vant to tell you that all the silkvorms have died, and silk has gone up." His son was present and heard his father's explanation, and thought it was fine. His father went to dinner and left his boy in charge of the store. Another lady customer came in to buy some tape, and, like his father, he priced it to her at twice the usual retail price. She complained, and he replied: "Vell, madam, I vant to tell you that all the tapevorms have died, and der price has gone up." His explanation had as much reason to it as that now given by the merchants for extortion and open robbery. If prices continue to increase, the public will soon be cut so short in food supplies that all the "tapeworms" will die sure enough.

Now, we will find the same old greedy heart in business operated by hydroelectric power as is manifested in the business now. I imagine I can hear some time in the future, when our posterity is meeting with the same conditions of extortion that we are to-day, the voice of some Member's grandchild, after looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the vote on this bill, exclaiming "I wonder what made grandpa vote for that bill." Now, in order to command the respect of our grandchildren, in order to command the respect of posterity, and in order to command the respect of mankind, we ought to regulate this power by definite terms, so that in the future the rights of the people will be safe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man, and I think the committee yields to no one, in respect and admiration for the Interstate Commerce Commission; but there is a limit to all human power to work, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has had pressed down upon them now more work than they can do.

Another reason why the gentleman's amendment should not be agreed to, as I think, is that the Secretary of the Interior, as the question now stands, with so much of the land in public ownership and so many Federal questions involved, is, according to every witness that appeared before us, the proper one to carry on this work. We had before us ex-Secretary Fisher, Mr. Pinchot, Secretary Lane, George Otis Smith, and also numerous engineers. The time will, in the future, doubtless come when a Federal water-power commission will be created that will take over all the water-power interests in the War Department, in the Agricultural Department, and in the Interior Department, and will be a great constructive force in this country, as it ought to be. Yet I think there are but few of us now who will agree that we can carry out a program of that sort at this time, and I think there are still fewer of us who will agree that we ought to take away from the organized force in the department their ability and power to deal with this question. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not now organized to handle the development of water power on the public domain.

Again, on page 4 of the bill, in section 3, it specifically reserves to the Federal Government the right at any time to take the regulation away from the Secretary of the Interior and give it to such a body as Congress may decree. Whether it would be in keeping with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois and be the Interstate Commerce Commission, or whether it would be a Federal water-power commission, I do not know, nor do I know which is best; but in either event all rights are reserved to Congress, and I hope the gentleman's amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That each lease made in pursuance of this act shall provide for the diligent, orderly, and reasonable development and continuous operation of the water power, subject to market conditions, and may provide that the lessee shall at no time, without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, contract for the delivery to any one consumer of electrical energy in excess of 50 per cent of the total output.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "reasonable," in line 14, page 3, and insert the word "complete."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, strike out the word "reasonable" and insert the word "complete."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, under this bill the Secretary of the Interior is given absolute power and control over these enterprises. A wise Secretary of the Interior would undoubtedly, in deciding between various applicants, other things being equal, favor the applicant who promised the largest development. And, everything being equal, he should, it seems to me, favor the applicant who would agree to the practically complete development of the particular power proposed to be developed. Of course it would be necessary that he should give the individual or corporation proposing the development a reasonable length of time in which to provide for this development. But if we are to give the Secretary authority, unlimited authority, without any particular guide to its exercise, one Secretary might hold to one view of his duties and responsibilities and another Secretary to another.

Under a bill like this I doubt, without radically changing the character of the bill, if it would be possible to lay down a great number of rules to guide the Secretary, but we should at least adopt some, and one proper rule, it seems to me, would be a rule for the complete development within a reasonable time, depending upon the conditions of the market and the enterprise undertaken. The complete development, the complete utilization of a given opportunity, for power development is highly important. Nothing is more wasteful than the limited utilization of large opportunities for power development. I assume in any event that any Secretary would take that fact into consideration; but I think we should provide, as my amendment does, that in any grant which the Secretary makes he shall include, as one of the conditions, that eventually, and subject to the market conditions, there shall not only be a diligent and orderly but a complete development of the power.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the provision of this section provides for diligent work. This is important. It ought to be done. The provision provides for the orderly disposition of the work. It would apply to the dam, and to the survey, and to the engineering, and to the work after it had started in upon their reservoir, their dams, their conduits, and whatever might be necessary to complete the system, as well as the installation of the necessary machinery—a reasonable development.

Now, to say that it must be a complete development at once would be to say something that the gentleman from Wyoming would not want.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes nothing of the kind, as the gentleman from California will observe.

Mr. RAKER. Sure; I have it right here. I will call the gentleman's attention to it; a complete development at once, before you do any other work. You will notice——

Mr. MONDELL. All this development, this diligent development, this orderly development, is subject to the market conditions. If the gentleman will allow me—I do not want to take his time—all that I propose is that the Secretary, in making these contracts, shall make them with those who will agree to ultimately complete the development of all the available power.

Mr. RAKER. There is not any question as to what this language means; that each lease made in pursuance of this act shall provide for what? The lease shall provide for what? First, a diligent working of it; second, an orderly working of all the various conditions of the plant; and, third, a reasonable development. You do not want a man to say, "I am going to make a complete development at once." It should be a reasonable development, as he moves along from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, with a plant costing $10,000,000 or maybe $50,000,000. You should require that he must reasonably continue to invest his money and build his dam and his reservoirs and his ditches; and it must not only be reasonable, but it must be a continuous operation of the water power. That is all that could be asked under this, all subject to market conditions.

Now, the gentleman would not want to say——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Does not the gentleman also feel that when a project presents itself at the time the lease is entered into, it is impossible for anybody to tell just what may be or may not be a complete development of that project?

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman is eminently correct on that, and that was one of the matters considered by the committee—that there must be some judgment; there must be some discretion; there must be something connected with this work, so that a man could be in a position to work out the ultimate complete project as specified and as intended, so long as he reasonably develops that project.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary must exercise some discretion in these cases?

Mr. RAKER. Surely.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, as between an applicant who promises that within a reasonable length of time and subject to market conditions to completely develop the enterprise, and another applicant who simply promises to develop it along, which of those applicants should the Secretary give the preference to?

Mr. RAKER. That would not be enough facts upon which any Secretary or judge could determine.

Mr. MONDELL. Under this language the Secretary can not turn down the man who promises complete development and can turn down the man who gives no assurance in that direction.

Mr. RAKER. I believe it is unfortunate; but it is the consensus of opinion of this House so far that the Secretary should have that discretion. We hope it will work out all right. But any man who would come in and tell the Secretary, "I will complete this immediately," would of necessity be turned down by the Secretary as a fakir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has just remarked that "it seems to be the consensus of the House, so far at least, favors the provisions of this bill," and so forth. I want to remark the peculiarity of that remark in view of the fact that there are not 30 Members on the floor at the present moment, including three or four members of the committee itself, which has 21 members.

Mr. Chairman, with this bill we are running further and further into red tape, and any man who knows the West will understand what that means.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that there is less red tape in the provisions of this bill than under the present law to-day respecting that detestable revocable permit that has prevented the development of water power in the last 10 years in the West?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will reply to the gentleman by saying that, even when this bill is made into law, one will still have to go to the Secretary of Agriculture for certain permissions, and to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Reclamation Service, and to the Indian Bureau, and so on, for certain permissions on the same project. I had a case in point only yesterday. The valuable low lands between Seattle and Tacoma, both of which cities are on tidewater, is marked by a small stream that flows with so little movement that it moves either way. Sometimes it flows into the harbor in front of Seattle, and sometimes into the harbor in front of Tacoma. In either event it floods the rich surrounding territory at one of its ends or the other. As long ago as the 1st of June, attempts began to secure the right to place a small dam in that stream, so that its waters would always flow one way. The first release had to be obtained from the Reclamation Service in the Interior Department. The next release had to be received from the Geological Survey, in the Department of Agriculture. The survey had to make sure there is no water power in that dead-level stream. Then, the next release required is from the Indian Office, because there is a half section or so in the neighborhood given over to an Indian reservation known as the Muckleshoot Reservation; and after those permissions are received, one must go to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and get his O. K., and then pass the proposition up to the Secretary of the Interior, who will issue a permit for the commissioners of the two counties, who, after many years of loss and delay, have worked out this plan to go ahead with the work.

That work should be completed before the rainy season sets in out there—the 15th of September. The first of these applications was made in June, and they are not ready yet. I went yesterday to these various departments and saw all the clerks who have anything to do with it, and found a great number on their vacation. These papers are piled up. The departments are busy. Each one of these bills makes more work and more congestion. The work overlaps, and the more you take away from the States their rights to control their own domain and their own resources the greater will be the power of the bureaus, the more the congestion, to say nothing of greater delay and still more red tape.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, just a word on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The same question came up in the hearings, and I think the hearings dealt with it in an intelligent way. If I may, I will read what was there said. Mr. Pinchot was on the stand, and I may add that while my friend from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL, has often asserted that he is a good conservationist, we have not always been able to agree with him about it, but I find him in this particular instance going in excess and further than Mr. Pinchot would go. His amendment strikes out the word "reasonable" and compels them to make complete development. The effect of it would be that the Interior Department might require the power company to do an idle and a silly thing, to wit, to create power that could not be used or sold.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. I find that a real conservationist like myself frequently would require things that a make-believe conservationist never would think of requiring.

Mr. FERRIS. I thought, perhaps, the gentleman would add that. Now, let me read from the hearing:

Mr. PINCHOT. Then, on the same page, lines 15 and 16, "That each lease made in pursuance of this act shall provide for the reasonable development." I would like to insert there "provide for the prompt, orderly, and reasonable development," in accordance with the outline of policy submitted at the beginning.

Now, we did insert the suggestion made by Mr. Pinchot, and listen to what he says about it:

Enormous holdings of undeveloped water power by the big water-power interests make it very desirable, I think, that prompt development should be insisted on. Then, in the same section, lines 16 and 17, "continuous operation of the water power." That should be made, I think, "subject to market conditions."

And we put that in. He said further:

I do not think it is fair to insist that the companies should continuously operate in case market conditions were unfavorable.

Now, a company might have a water-power plant in Wyoming where they could generate 100,000 horsepower, where there was no market at that time for more than 50,000 horsepower. Surely no one would want them to generate power that could not be sold. That would merely be putting a burden on the consumer. This dead expense would be taken into consideration by the public utility commission that regulated it, if the regulation was in the States. If in the Secretary, he would be compelled to take it into consideration. Surely, few will desire to do any such thing. That would merely be a burden that the Secretary of the Interior would have to take into consideration in the event of regulation by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not my friend think that the Secretary of the Interior should have the authority, and that it should be a part of the contract that when there is a market there must be a complete development?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely, and that is included in the bill, as we think, because the bill provides for the reasonable, orderly, and prompt development according to the market conditions; so that if there be a demand for the power they must not only generate it, but develop it properly, orderly, and in a reasonable way. This is all provided for. That phase of the bill was carefully considered.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. In drawing a lease, would you use the word "reasonable" where you wanted to obtain a certain amount of work done?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman asks about a specific case. The Secretary of the Interior has unbounded authority to put in the lease any provision that he thinks will more effectively carry out the provisions of this act, and I should not like to render a horseback opinion as to whether a specific word should go in or out; but I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Interior will put in every provision for the public interest that he can put in and at the same time procure development. I am satisfied that is what the gentleman would have him do.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Is it your opinion that the word "reasonable" would go into the lease, and be a part of the language of the lease?

Mr. FERRIS. Not necessarily. This section does not pretend to lay down what the specific provisions of the lease shall be; it merely provides what the law shall be. Then a later section does authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make such a lease as he desires in order to carry out the terms of the lease. It is possible, of course, that he might put it in or put it out.

The question at issue has nothing to do with the formal parts of the lease.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 15, page 3, after the word "conditions," strike out the remainder of the section and insert a period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion, to perfect the section, before the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is voted on.

Mr. MONDELL. This does not strike out the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman's amendment strikes out the portion of the section which I wish to perfect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will send his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD:

Page 3, line 16, strike out "may" and insert "shall." In lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if there is any merited criticism of this bill, it is that we lodge too much discretion in the Secretary of the Interior, and the amendment I propose seeks to take away discretion which I think could very easily be abused by the Secretary or his subordinates, to the disadvantage of the large number of consumers of hydroelectricity. I can not conceive of a case where we should allow the Secretary to permit a contract to be entered into whereby more than 50 per cent of the hydroelectricity generated might be disposed of to any one consumer.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Can not the gentleman conceive of a case where about the only consumer that is available in a community near a water-power site is a town or city? Now, some one takes that water power, finances it and develops it, and they ought to have the right to sell all of its power to that municipality.

Mr. STAFFORD. That objection does not lie to the amendment I offer, for the reason that there is a provision in this bill permitting municipalities to generate their own power; and even in the case the gentleman cites it would be far better not to allow the generated power to be contracted for by the municipality alone, but compel the company to have some reserve surplus power that may be distributed through competition for the benefit of other users.

In section 7 it shows the real effect of the provision, because there authority is given to the Secretary to lengthen the contract beyond the original leasing period of 50 years. You may authorize him to enter into a contract for 100 years, and saddle on the users, or those seeking this power, a condition whereby they will be unable to obtain necessary power. I believe that these private companies should not be permitted to sell all their power to one concern, but by this provision you are vesting in the Secretary of the Interior full authority to contract with one person for all the power generated, on the idea that there is but one who will want to use it, when others may want the power, or later new parties may need it and can not obtain it. That will be a monopoly in the hands of this one person, sanctified by a contract executed by the Secretary of the Interior, and perhaps lengthened beyond the original leasing period of 50 years, and perhaps in perpetuity. It will be saddled on the community and on the users in that neighborhood for long years thereafter without any chance for power from the lessee. Although this merely provides in this section for a lease for 50 years, nevertheless by section 7 you authorize a contract beyond a 50-year period, and wherever such is authorized you are binding all persons, present or in the future, who may need power with this exclusive contract from which they can not gain relief—that is monopoly carried to an extreme degree.

Take the Hydroelectric Co. of Canada. They are not disposing of that great power to any one company. They are seeking new users and new municipalities, and the various localities are getting the benefit of it. But here you would hamstring the localities and new manufacturers who would come into the territory after the power is developed by their not being able to get any power at all. Such a possible condition should not be permitted to arise.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin has proposed an amendment to section 2, but has addressed most of his argument to section 7. It seems to me they are separate propositions. I hope the amendment suggested by him to section 2 will not be adopted. Because the section as drawn does not fit some particular case which the gentleman has in mind he thinks the section is not properly drawn. If the amendment which he suggests is adopted, it is very easy to think of a number of cases wherein the object of the bill would not be carried out. It might well be that there would be a water-power site capable of developing, say, 20,000 horsepower, near a city or prosperous town that was anxious to get electricity up to that amount for lighting purposes or street-car purposes or domestic purposes. It might be that the only chance of getting it would be through this water-power site. It might be that under the laws of their State or the provisions of their charter that they would not have the power or right as a municipality to go into the business of developing water power and manufacturing electricity even for their own use. Now, in such an instance as that a city must depend upon some individual or association or corporation to finance and undertake to develop that site and sell the power to the city under proper regulations controlled, possibly, by a commission of the State.

I the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin should be adopted, it would mean that this company could not sell more than 50 per cent of the generated power to that municipality. There might not be any other user within such a distance as would make it economical or profitable to transmit the power which the company developed, and that would simply mean that this section would force that company to finance and develop a proposition under a 50 per cent income basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the supposititious case which the gentleman suggests. If there happened to be manufacturing concerns in that community, there would be no power for them if they wanted it. I am trying to protect the small producer rather than to have a monopoly.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The gentleman proposes to take the case that I suppose, and then he does not take it. My case is where the only customer is the municipality. But take the case which the gentleman suggests, and in addition to the municipality there are other customers. In that case the section as originally drawn fits it exactly, and, in the discretion of the Secretary, there may be a provision that the company shall not be allowed to sell more than 50 per cent to one company or individual. Unless there is that discretionary power vested in the Secretary of the Interior, it is impossible to fit that kind of a proposition to these individual cases—in one instance to one sort of a case and in another instance to another sort of a case. In all those cases where there is only one possible consumer, such as a municipality in a Western State, the amendment proposed by the gentleman would defeat the object of the bill so far as giving the municipality power is concerned. In those cases where there are other consumers, the authority ought to be left in the bill so as to insure the small consumer getting the power.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not defeat it as far as 50 per cent is concerned, and they would have the other 50 per cent to distribute to other manufacturing concerns in those localities.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to be utterly unable to consider a supposititious case. In the case that I have indicated the other 50 per cent would have to go to waste, because it would be limited to 50 per cent to one consumer—the only consumer in the field.

In all cases where there are several consumers or applicants for the electricity generated, the Secretary should, and doubtless would, bring into action the authority given him under the wording of this section, as submitted to the House by the committee, to the end that no consumer would be shut out, but that every applicant for electricity would be assured of getting it. This section was drafted by the committee to prevent monopoly, and there can be no doubt that it would have that effect if enacted into law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I never have seen the time when some one could not make a very ingenious argument in favor of monopoly, but I am rather surprised that my friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] should make an argument in favor of monopoly. Of course, there is only one consumer anywhere, if you start in with the theory that you are going to have only one consumer; but there is not a place in the United States anywhere where there is not more than one actual consumer of electric power. The bill provides that no more than 50 per cent of the power created shall be sold to one consumer unless the Secretary of the Interior, as a matter of favoritism, gives that permission. I do not think the Secretary of the Interior ought to have the right to determine, as a matter of favoritism, that he will let any producing company sell more than 50 per cent of its production to one person.

The only way that you can have competition is by competition, and the only way you can have real control of the price is by some sort of competition. If the producing company sells 50 per cent of its power to one concern, it has competition. If it sells the entire 100 per cent to one concern, nobody will be asking to regulate the rates, no question will be raised about the rates, for the consumer of the power who has the monopoly of the power produced will not ask to have any regulation of the rates. They have agreed upon that, and the provision in the bill giving the Secretary of the Interior the power to regulate the charges absolutely falls, so far as any effect is concerned, when you let the producer sell all of the power to one consumer. It is nonsense to say that you will not have more than one consumer. The purpose of creating this power is to furnish it to consumers in the neighborhood. My friend and colleague, whom I greatly respect, suggests a supposititious case, where there is a municipal corporation that wants to buy all of the power. That is just it. We do not want it so fixed that even a municipal corporation can buy all of the power and charge what it pleases. The power ought to be created principally for the benefit of real consumers, people who are engaged in manufacturing as well as other businesses.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. There are other provisions in the bill, are there not, that would regulate the charges that a municipality would make, and would insure their reasonableness?

Mr. MANN. There are not, and there can not be.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is it the gentleman's view of the bill that if the Secretary of the Interior grants a right of way over a public land his fixing of conditions in the lease would override the State law where the public utilities commission fixes the price at which they must sell their output to the consumer?

Mr. MANN. I think it would, and the bill says so as it stands. I am not going to enter into a constitutional argument during the remainder of my five minutes on the question of whether when we grant a power on an Indian reservation, where our only right is the right over the reservation, and the line is extended across a straight line, under the terms of this bill we regulate the charges and cut out the State or whether the State regulates the charges. I hope that will be corrected in the bill before it passes, but it is in the bill now.

Mr. RAKER. Take the case I suggested. It is all within one State. The Secretary of the Interior gives a lease for certain lands. He fixes certain conditions. Unquestionably under this bill the State utilities commission would fix the charge that this corporation or individual will furnish its power to the consumer for, would it not?

Mr. MANN. Yes; but if there is only one consumer nobody will ask to have the charge fixed. That is the point I am making. If a producing company sells all of its power to one consumer, that is a matter of contract between the producing company and the consumer, and nobody calls it to the attention of the Interior Department. Nobody is interested in it, and the Interior Department, like other departments, seldom acts upon these matters until its attention has been called to them by other parties who are interested.

Mr. RAKER. That is true.

Mr. MANN. But if you have competition, then there are other people interested, and that is the reason, I think, there ought to be enforced competition. Therefore I favor the amendment. I do not believe this House ought to create a monopoly, as this would do.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the question of monopoly plays such a rampant part as has been indicated here, and I personally do not think any part of the gentleman's amendment ought to be adopted. I think it ought not to be adopted for the good, sufficient, and sane reason offered by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON]. Undoubtedly the Secretary ought to have the authority to keep the power company from selling all of the power to one concern, to the detriment of others, but at the same time the Secretary of the Interior ought to have the power to permit the power company to sell 55 per cent or 60 per cent or a hundred per cent to a concern, if there were no other demand for the power and the public interests required it. Suppose that in a given community 100,000 horsepower were generated at a given dam. Suppose a city or a municipality was the main market for that power, and that it would require 60 per cent of that power to light the city. Suppose 30 per cent only were required for carrying on irrigation and the necessities of the local community. Does anyone really think in all such cases Congress should be troubled with special bills. Such cases are entirely probable, such cases will surely arise, and the first thing they will be compelled to do is to run to Congress and secure legislation that ought to be included here.

Suppose the city needed, as I said, 55 per cent of the power generated at a given dam. Suppose there was no market at all for the rest of it. Congress would be confronted with a special bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to that city, or rather, authorizing the power company to sell to that city 55 per cent of the power, while the rest is going to waste. I think if we want to add anything that would really affect monopoly you might incorporate in section 2 that the Secretary shall do so only when the public interest would be subserved thereby. I find that some such suggestion was made in the hearings by Mr. Pinchot, although he thought that 50 per cent was a good one. On page 140 of the hearings, if you have them before you, you will find the following:

Mr. PINCHOT. I have no definite suggestion to make, but I think it ought to be considered, because they are frequently in a position to discriminate between consumers, and often do, especially between large and small consumers—and often with good reason; sometimes, also, without good reason—and it might be practicable to make that clause read, "regulation and control of service and charges for service to consumers without unfair discrimination."

Now, there would be a reason for the incorporation of such an amendment as that, and that would undoubtedly take care of any suggestion, even the one the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes, and to put the Secretary in a position where he could not permit the power company to sell 51 or 55 per cent would be an unworkable proposition and would bring in a lot of special bills, and it would be a just criticism against the workability of the bill and really would not accomplish anything good for anybody.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will permit me to read further from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. There is a little attempt to do that in line 20, you will observe, Mr. Pinchot, in the preceding section 2, inasmuch as we did limit it to not more than 50 per cent of the total output.

Mr. THOMSON. Will not the whole situation be comprehended in the wording, "regulation and control of service"?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes; I think so. I merely wanted to bring the thought up. I am not clear that it ought to go in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do I understand that is by Mr. Pinchot?

Mr. FERRIS. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it Mr. Pinchot of Pennsylvania, or Long Island, N. Y., or Washington?

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman perhaps knows better where Mr. Pinchot lives than I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I simply want to say if he conserves electric energy as well as he conserved the forest reserves of the State of Washington, he will put us all in bondage for a thousand years without a wheel turning.

Mr. FERRIS. I know my good friend from Washington does not agree with the policy of Mr. Pinchot relative to the Forestry Service. This is not a question as to whether the Forestry Service should be maintained and kept going as Mr. Pinchot wants it to be, neither is it a question of destroying the forest reserves, as the gentleman wants to; but, on the contrary, it is a question of trying to develop the water power in the West. Let me say to the gentleman from Washington, so far as I am concerned, any odium that comes on Mr. Pinchot at his hands, or to any other man of any party who has given such careful, painstaking thought to this question, shall not deter me from carefully gathering information from him where it is helpful. Mr. Pinchot has given patriotic attention to this question. His views are generally pretty well received in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a minute in order to answer a question by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand, from provisions of the bill elsewhere than in this first paragraph, the Secretary of the Interior is to be clothed with power to make rules and regulations incident to the lease, sale, and so forth, of the power generated by these projects?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true; but he is given that power in the first section.

Mr. MILLER. If that be true, what additional power does he receive from the last part here, where it says he "may" do so and so?

Mr. FERRIS. I assume they are working under rules and regulations. I do not believe that is vital, but I will say that the irrigation people out in the West and one of the Senators from the West thought there ought to be a positive limitation against the selling of all of the power produced to one concern, and that was incorporated in the bill at their suggestion. If you force the Secretary to do an arbitrary, harsh thing, and if, as a matter of fact, the irrigationists needed 35 per cent of the power or the city or municipality needs 55 or 65 per cent, it would bring back on us a lot of special bills that this House is overridden with now. We of the committee thought we ought to make it emphatic that the Secretary should have a little discretion whether he should or should not allow the 50 per cent, or rather more than 50 per cent, to be sold to one concern. It is impossible to escape giving the administrative authority some discretion, some laxity; otherwise we have a bill that looks good, but is ponderous and not workable. We want the rights of the public carefully preserved, but we want a razor that will shave also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced the ayes seems to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. FERRIS) there were—ayes 17, noes 12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes to strike out all of section 2, after the word "conditions," in line 16, and I am quite sure that the gentleman on the other side not approving the amendment that has just been adopted will vote to strike out that part of the section. This discretion attempted to be lodged with the Secretary of the Interior would very likely be abused. What is there sacred about the division in half? If the company should not be allowed to sell over 50 per cent to one consumer, why should it be allowed to sell either 40 per cent or 35 per cent or 49 per cent or 47½ per cent to any one consumer? The fact is that under the laws of a number of States there are preferences in the matter of water diversion, and the highest preference is for the use of water for domestic and municipal purposes or for the development of power to be used for domestic and municipal purposes, and if a water right were granted purely for domestic or municipal purposes or for the development of power to be used by municipalities, the Secretary of the Interior clearly could not be given the right to say that the power should not be used for that purpose.

But if some one should desire to build a great plant in the mountains, far from any other present demand for water power, for the purpose of extracting nitrogen from the atmosphere, they could not do so under this provision unless they could get the Secretary of the Interior to let them use their own water power for the purposes for which they developed it.

Out yonder in the West we have a great deal of phosphate rock, and we hope to have water-power development for the purpose of manufacturing this rock for use as fertilizer. If the company or individual developing it could not use all of its water power for that purpose, they probably would never undertake the enterprise.

But the most objectionable part of this whole matter is that it proposes and lays down a rule of law under which it would preclude a public-service commission from compelling the sale of power to a number of users. You fix the sacred amount of 50 per cent and you have given the Secretary of the Interior authority beyond that amount, and by so doing you have fixed the right in the power company without regard to any powers of public-utility commissions. You give the corporation the right to sell at least 50 per cent to one consumer without regard to other demands in the community. One great objection to it is that we have not the power to do it. The other is that we ought not to do it if we had the power. These matters are entirely under the control of public-service commissions. They have the right not only to fix the rate but to make rules with regard to the utilization of the current, and yet we propose first to say that the commission shall have no authority up to 50 per cent, and beyond that the authority shall rest with the Secretary of the Interior down here, and the State public-utility commission shall have nothing to say about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I know, at least so far as I am concerned, that the gentleman was incorrect in his first supposition, namely, that having voted against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] we were now all prepared—those of us who opposed that amendment—to support his amendment. I believe the proposition involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin was not a good thing. I believe that that which is involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is worse, for if that amendment were to prevail it would then certainly mean that a concern could develop a water-power site and sell all of its power to one consumer or not as it chose—as far as this bill is concerned at least—unless there might be some rule or regulation of a State commission, or something of that kind, that could reach the case. That might be true in some States and might not be true in other States. I believe there should be some proposition in this bill along the lines of this section. If it must be a mandatory one, such as provided by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, I would rather have it than to have nothing in there at all. It seems to me it would have been much better to have permitted the Secretary of the Interior to regulate this proposition as the facts of each case might demand. It seems to me there is too much fear being expressed here about lodging too much power in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. Right along that line I would like to call the attention of the committee to some testimony that was given before our Committee on Public Lands, and to a remark made by Mr. Pinchot.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is this Mr. Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, New York, or where?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I decline to yield further. The gentleman knows very well to whom I am referring.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of the United States of America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of the United States of America? I did not hear distinctly. Is it Amos or Gifford?

Mr. BRYAN. You will meet him over in the Senate after March 4.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield further.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-nine gentlemen are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 236 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of absentees for printing in the RECORD and Journal.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] is recognized.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, when my friend from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] made the point of no quorum I was about to quote a remark made by Mr. Pinchot in the hearings on this bill had before the Committee on the Public Lands. I presume my friend from Washington felt that the views of Mr. Pinchot on a subject of this kind were of such importance that they should be heard not only by him and others in the House at that time but also by as many as could be brought into the House by a roll call, and therefore he raised the point of no quorum.

Mr. Chairman, the remark that I wished to quote referred to the question of giving power to an executive officer. A great deal has been said in the debate back and forth upon the amendments to this bill to the effect that we are giving the Secretary of the Interior too much power. On that question Mr. Pinchot says:

> You can never give an executive officer authority to do good work without giving him at the same time enough power to do bad work.

If the authority that we propose to give to an executive official is going to put enough power in his hands to make it possible to do bad work, I think that fact in and of itself is no argument that we should not give him that authority where it is essential that he should have it if he is going to be put in a position where he can do good work; and I think, with reference to the subject matter of section 2, to which the pending amendment relates, that it is essential to give the authority which that section purported to give the Secretary of the Interior in its original form.

Now, the amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], would strike out of section 2 everything after the word "conditions," in line 16, page 3; and, if you do that, it simply means that, so far as Federal regulation is concerned, a company that develops a water-power site and sells power will have the right and authority to sell all of the power which it generates to one consumer, and it should not have the opportunity of doing anything of that sort, except in proper cases, where it will result in no harm to any other consumer or applicant for the electricity.

There may be instances where it would be perfectly proper for the company to sell all the power which it generates to one consumer. There may also be instances where the lessee should have no such right, in spite of what my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says. And, by the way, I am sorry that my colleague stated that I was speaking for monopoly. I was not, and I am sure that he does not believe that I was. I think what he meant to say was that the language I was contending for in section 2, and which I have alleged would operate against monopoly, would, in his judgment, have the opposite effect and operate for monopoly. It is simply a difference in the views we entertain as to the effect of the language. My contention is that it would operate against monopoly.

The amendment which has been adopted, and which was offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes it mandatory that in every lease issued under this bill there shall be a provision inserted to the effect that the lessee shall at no time contract for the delivery to any one consumer of electrical energy in excess of 50 per cent of the total output.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Now, that amendment, which was suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and which has been adopted, will simply mean this: Where there is a municipality in the vicinity of a water-power site that wants to avail itself of the power, and where there are, let us say, other possible consumers, consisting of different manufacturing concerns, and where the municipality would like to get 75 per cent of the power and could use that much, and where these four manufacturing concerns only wish to apply for 5 per cent each, it would mean that, of the 100 per cent possible in that water-power site, 50 per cent will go to the municipality, because under the bill, as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, it can get no more, and 5 per cent will go to each of the four manufacturing concerns and the other 30 per cent will go to waste; and if the company develops that power to its capacity, it will simply mean that it will sell only 70 per cent and throw away the other 30 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I notice that in section 2 of the bill the amount of power to be sold to one concern is limited to 50 per cent, to be generated from a single plant?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I notice in section 3 that provision is made for the physical combination of different plants.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. When you combine several plants, how are you to tell whether you sell more than 50 per cent from any particular plant?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. You can not; but the provision of the section to which the gentleman calls attention, for the tying in of different plants, is a purely temporary proposition, and is designed to take care of emergencies, where one plant is broken down, either in whole or in part, and where, to serve the people whom it is serving, it must have help from some plant that is near by, and must have facilities for tying in for the time being.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. My understanding of the theory of permitting plants to combine is to permit them to render assistance to each other all the time, so that they could take care of different classes of patrons more economically than they could if they were compelled to remain separate.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. My understanding of the provisions is not the same as that of the gentleman from Minnesota. I do not believe that is the intention or the effect of the section to which he calls attention. I trust the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will be voted down. If it is not, any lessee, under the bill, will have the right at any time to sell all of its power, or 100 per cent of its lighting facilities to some one consumer, to the exclusion of any other applicant who may wish for power or light, or apply for it, which, I think, ought not to be.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the quotation made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON] from Mr. Gifford Pinchot, and the plea he was making that you have to give these gentlemen power to do evil in order to give them power to do good. I was wondering what was the matter with that distinguished gentleman, Mr. Pinchot, when he was at the head of the Forestry Bureau. I find that Mr. Gifford Pinchot was appointed June 21, 1898, Chief of the Bureau of Forestry, Department of the Interior, and from the time that he accepted that position and became the recognized authority upon forestry in this country until the time he went out of power after President Taft was elected the railroads of this country stole over 2,000,000 acres of the public domain; and I challenge any man upon either side of this House to point to a single word or a single sentence that Gifford Pinchot ever uttered in the way of protest against that steal. My distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] stood upon the floor of this House a few months ago and denounced that transaction of the Santa Fe Railroad and of the Northern Pacific Railroad as a steal and a public outrage; yet when it all occurred Gifford Pinchot was at the head of the Forest Service. Why did he not protest? When the Santa Fe Railroad exchanged 1,200,000 acres of land in the forest reserves in Arizona, worth by their own estimate from 15 to 25 cents an acre, and received an equal number of acres, some of it the best-timbered land in the United States to-day, worth $200 an acre, where was Gifford the Good? Where was Pinchot, that he did not see these steals and protest against them? They have attempted to excuse him on the ground that he did not have authority. Did he have too much authority then or not enough?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Not enough.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Very well. Then they moved him up and gave him more authority, after they transferred that bureau over to the Agricultural Department. They transferred it over to the Agricultural Department in 1905. They increased the power of the distinguished Mr. Pinchot. Then what occurred? Then he no longer kept silent, but actively assisted the railroads to secure the timbered lands of the United States. The Northern Pacific Railroad out in Montana had 240,000 acres of practically worthless land; it was included in a forest reserve, with Mr. Pinchot's help, and with his assistance that worthless land was exchanged for an equal number of acres, some of it the best timbered land yet remaining on the public domain. Some of this land was in my own State. Did he not have power enough then? How much more power do you want to give these bureau chiefs? He did not have power enough to open his mouth and tell the public of these gigantic frauds. Why did he not protest? I am getting a little bit weary of constantly parading this great patriot here before this House as somebody whose advice is to be followed above all others upon any subject under the sun, at least until some friend of his can stand upon the floor of this House and explain his transactions. Nobody denies these steals. Everybody in the United States knows that this was a fraud upon the Government, the worst in our history. Nobody will deny that during the time that Mr. Pinchot was at the head of the Forestry Service more of the forest land was stolen in this country by the railroads than in all the rest of the years in our history combined. Now let some man stand up here and put his finger upon some protest that Gifford Pinchot made against that steal by the railroads. It was his duty to speak. He was in office. He kept silent; and a man who will not speak when it is his duty to speak is just as guilty as if he helped to assist in the transaction. During the time that Mr. Pinchot was connected with the Forest Service, when he was the one man that the public was lead to believe was protecting the forests upon the public domain, the railroads practically stole more than 2,000,000 acres, without one word of protest from Mr. Pinchot, who then, as now, posed as the special, self-appointed guardian of the people. Why did he keep silent? Other officials protested vigorously. Why did he say nothing? Having kept silent then, when an official, why does he have so much to say now, when a private citizen?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment at the expiration of 7 minutes, 5 minutes of which will go to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should like five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is to strike out the last word.

Mr. FERRIS. I take it that that is withdrawn, and the real amendment is the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. On that I ask unanimous consent to close debate in 20 minutes, 5 minutes of which will be controlled by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], 5 minutes by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]——

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I intended to offer the exact amendment that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offered, and upon that I desire to address myself.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman need not reserve any time for me. I do not desire any time. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. We might as well discuss these things here now.

Mr. FERRIS. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. MILLER. I presume I shall need 15 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment and all amendments in 30 minutes. It has been debated an hour already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, nearly an hour ago, when the name of Gifford Pinchot was mentioned, my colleague from Washington, Mr. JOHNSON, gagged, and then he got up and asked a question. He did that twice; then he made the point of no quorum. The name of Mr. Pinchot seemed in some way to gag the gentleman. A few minutes after the roll call my other colleague from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, arose and let it be known that the name of Pinchot had gagged him also.

Mr. Pinchot or any other public man in this country who has been associated with the timber and the Forestry Service does not need defense when the gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, is his accuser. The gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, out on the stump in the State of Washington and in this House at every opportunity has defended the Ballinger plan of handling the public domain and has praised Secretary Ballinger at every opportunity. The gentleman has been a Member of this House for 12 years, while all these steals which he talks about were carried on. He ought to be the last man to talk about the particular individual who stopped him and his colleagues, who stopped these timber looters, who were among the very men in the State of Washington who were keeping my colleague here in this House by backing him in political meetings and nominating him in Republican conventions and indorsing him at every opportunity they ever had to indorse him.

Here is what my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, in 1910 thought about Mr. Ballinger and his land policy, who, as Secretary of the Interior, found it entirely impossible to put into operation his ideas on these questions because of the storm of public opinion against those ideas and policies:

> I believe in the integrity and the ability and the grim courage of Secretary Richard A. Ballinger. I believe he is right. I believe he is doing his duty. I believe he is fighting the battle of the great West. He is an honor to his State and to his country.

Is it any wonder he does not believe in Gifford Pinchot? Nobody ever accused Mr. Pinchot of believing in Secretary Ballinger. However, Mr. Pinchot has never assailed Mr. Ballinger's integrity, nor do I. It is unfortunate and unjust for anyone to do that. I say that a personal sense of his own dereliction ought to make him the last man to censure the men who stopped those who would loot the public domain. He did not try to stop it. A short time ago, when he was discussing this matter, I interrogated him as to whether he attempted to do anything to interfere with it by introducing any bill, but his voice was then and has been all along as silent as the grave. But now, to-day, "Hark, from the tomb there comes a doleful sound," and we hear him railing and casting out aspersions against the man who interfered with the very things that made the "good old days" of the State of Washington possible. Those things were done and the public domain was looted, as the gentleman knows, through legislative enactment. In pretty nearly every case laws passed through this House, voted for by Members from the State of Washington, sent here by the Republican Party, made possible great thefts that were committed. The gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, has never introduced a bill to stop it.

And so my colleague from the timber district of southwest Washington, Mr. JOHNSON, rises on the floor and his heart aches, simply aches, when he thinks of the great Indian reservation, the Quinaielt, and sees a lot of timber that has not got a Weyerhaeuser fence around it. [Laughter.] When he walks along and in his imagination sees a Weyerhaeuser fence he is happy, but when he comes to the end of the lane and casts his eyes through that splendid virgin timber of the Northwest, the most valuable in this country, held by the Government of the United States, held by the public who live in the State of Washington, then is the time that he sets up a howl, and then is the time he begins to filibuster. When these matters are forced upon his attention you hear him railing and talking of the men who have caused the reservations to be made.

The statement that Mr. Pinchot is responsible for the lieu-land selections by the railroads and the timber barons or the robbing of the public domain are as false as any statement that could possibly emanate from any gentleman on the floor of this House. It is well known that Gifford Pinchot is specially desirous of preserving the public domain, and has been called a dreamer, an eccentric, and all that kind of a thing by his enemies. Everybody knows that he has not participated in the lootings, but that he has been the barrier in the way of these men when they wanted to do the looting.

My colleague knows as well as he knows his name that he is associated politically and in every way with the very men that got that timber. He knows very well that he has never fought them, and he knows that he would not fight them now if there was any chance of their getting any more timber. [Laughter.] It is absurd and ridiculous for him to try to make capital in attacking the man who was the very foundation and source of the influence and legislation that prevented and stopped the lootings that he tries to make capital of.

Now, the gentleman from Washington, Mr. JOHNSON, came down here as editor and manager of the Home Defender, a paper that raises all kinds of war whoops about saving the flag. [Laughter and applause.] He says now he has parted with that paper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I should like three or five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am willing to give way to a crook. I am willing to give way to a man who is wrong, essentially wrong, and does not deny it, does not claim to be anything else, who has no subterfuge. I do not want it understood that I am applying that term to the gentleman from Washington; but I do despise a faker, a make-believe, a sham, and I do apply that to the gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, because his speech here is an absolute fake. Every time the subject comes up these gentlemen come in here, bitter foes of the procedure that is going on. Now, it is very strange to me that men that are known as friends of forestry do not raise any complaint against Mr. Pinchot.

These gentlemen started a legislative program against the Forest Service. The gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, when the Agricultural bill was up, moved to strike out the Chugach National Forest. He had already submitted a resolution for an investigation of the Forest Service, and it had gone to the State of Washington and in certain standpat papers had been widely advertised. They said he had fired "his second gun in his comprehensive attack against the Forest Service." Tremendous advertising was given in all the old Republican Ballinger papers out there. What was the result? When they reached the final vote on his motion for the elimination of this reserve, the one most criticized of all which they planned to get rid of, because it had the most valuable coal within it, he got three votes—one was the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE, and the other was his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON. Three votes! That was his following, his indorsement. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] insisted on a division, so as to demonstrate how many there were who would sustain or support him. That was the comprehensive attack; that was the big thing that the papers out there had advertised. He has not made another attempt to get a vote to this day.

Now, I want to call attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the remarks of my colleague will probably be flashed over the wires to the standpat papers in the State of Washington, and it will be said that Mr. HUMPHREY just chastised Mr. Pinchot to a turn on this floor, and very likely attempts will be made to make the impression that it was all done with the approval of the House. But when it comes to votes, they will get no indorsement of their propositions. I am convinced that my suggestion that this is downright faking is true and that the Members of this House believe it. [Laughter and applause.] My colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, came down here obsessed with the idea that the flag was about to be destroyed, or something of that kind.

He founded the Home Defender. He now says that he has given it away, but it is still run by the Home Defender Co., founded by him, and I understand the same agents of the gentleman are involved in the paper now as were when he brought it here originally; and if I am wrong in that I am subject to correction. Here is one of the things published in that paper in April, 1914:

> The fact is that neither I nor my associates believe in labor unions as they are generally conducted. They profit at the expense of the unorganized; they blackmail legislators and create demagogues in and out of office; they help the lazy and inefficient at the expense of the efficient and industrious, etc. But our serious objection is to their lawlessness and their attempt to raise themselves above the law and law-abiding citizens.

My colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, condemns the Secretary of State for his blundering stupidity, and the inane President, and all that kind of thing; and as he does that, so my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, condemns the public men. He railed about the Vice President of the United States, he railed about Jane Addams, and he railed about Secretary Bryan, and associated them all together with Bill Haywood, the I. W. W. leader.

What are we to conclude about this? Are you gentlemen going to conclude that the people of the State of Washington are in accord with that kind of ideas and those suggestions? I say they are not. Gifford Pinchot went out there recently, and he was announced to be at the Commercial Club. I was there as one of the members of the audience, and I testify to the Members of this House that the people could not get in to hear him. He had another meeting at another place, and that was crowded; and when MILES POINDEXTER ran for the United States Senate, having fought Mr. Ballinger and his ideas, and having gone to Alaska with Gifford Pinchot and associated with him in the work he was doing, MILES POINDEXTER, although he lived in the wrong part of the State at that time, geographically, nevertheless was elected by a tremendous majority, carrying all of the State except one county, as I remember it.

When Mr. Roosevelt came to ask for a vindication of his policies and ideas he won by 50,000 votes over Mr. Taft and some 20,000 votes over Mr. Wilson. So I say to the Members of this House, you are not to be misled by the fact that two of my colleagues continually hound conservation, and they do it in the meanest way in the world. The worst kind of a lie is half a lie, and when you put a half truth in it you make it a worse kind of a falsehood than it would be if it were all false. Now, then, in their attacks on the forestry conservation they say, "We believe in conservation, we believe in conservation, but we hate the Pinchot brand," and that is where they fake and practice make-believe on the floor of this House. Their attacks are inconsistent and are entirely unworthy of consideration. They do not believe what they say themselves.

Under my leave to print in the RECORD I insert the following, being some more of the article I read from in debate, giving the mission of this Home Defender, founded by my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, and known by all who know Mr. JOHNSON very well to be the very apple of his eye. He loves the paper and is devoted to its mission:

> However, at the present time we conceive it is not a part of our propaganda to fight labor unions or unionism as such.
> Below them, in the lowest or next to the lowest strata of our society, is developing a spirit far more dangerous to our institutions, to our form of government, and to our industries, than the labor unions. We refer to the revolutionary socialists typified in the organization known as the I. W. W. These recruits from below, criminals who think to masquerade as workingmen without employment, and, retaining their vicious tendencies, to find opportunities to exploit them under cover of an organization and to commit crimes en masse; or from above—labor unions—the discontented, and generally worthless, who fall from the ranks.
> Between these revolutionary socialists and the general public are the labor unions.
> To destroy them would merely bring society face to face with the revolutionary socialists, whose ranks would be immensely swelled by accessions from the disrupted unions.
> As the especial mission of the Home Defender is to oppose revolutionary socialism, and as we seek support on that basis, we feel that we should devote our efforts primarily to that end.
> We have no objections to others fighting the labor unions from top to bottom and on every proposition—but that is not our job as we see it. No one gives us any support on that ground, and we feel we would be biting off considerably more than we could conveniently masticate if we attempted to buck the labor unions single handed.
> The Home Defender Co. has no affiliations or relations with employers or associations of employers which would guarantee us support in such an undertaking. On the contrary, should we attack the labor unions as such we would merely invite much trouble for us personally and be left to foot the bills.
> We are none of us men of means and have no factories to be burned or other property to be destroyed; the Home Defender is not a money-making institution, and probably never will be. Therefore, when actuated by patriotism and a desire to do good we give our time freely and make up the deficit from our private funds we feel that we are doing all that could be expected without departing from our path to attack the labor unions.
>
> We have neither the time nor the inclination nor the sinews of war for such a task.
> On the other hand, we have no fear of them when they are in the wrong. When they are captured and captained by the revolutionary socialists, when they violate the law, when they commit violence, or when they seek immunity from the laws which apply to other classes, we shall not hesitate to condemn them unsparingly.
> Personally, while not denying the right of workingmen to organize any more than employers or professional men, we are in favor of the "open shop," and if we ever acquire proper support we would like to make the Home Defender a great "open-shop" newspaper. Published at the National Capital, it would be very effective.

This article is signed by Mr. JOHNSON'S close personal friend and original associate in this Washington enterprise, Mr. William Wolff Smith, secretary-treasurer of the Home Defender Co.

Under my leave to print I am inserting the following article taken from the Home Defender of April, 1914:

A LOSING FIGHT IN COLORADO—UNITED MINE WORKERS HAVE LOST OUT AND ARE HEADED STRAIGHT FOR THE ROCKS.

That outlaw schooner "United Mine Workers" is tossing about in deep water and headed straight for the rocks, says the Trinidad (Colo.) Chronicle-News. The melancholy days have come for the strikers in Colorado. The prospect of a settlement is more remote than ever. It is the beginning of the end of the battle for recognition.

The coal miners of Colorado have been idle since September 23. The courage of the once boastful leaders is waning. The rank and file of the army of strikers are growing dissatisfied. They are realizing the hopelessness of the struggle. They see no chance for victory. In other words, it is "all off" with the "cause."

The miners of the East are getting tired of supporting the hopeless industrial conflict in district No. 15. They have been taxed and assessed to that point where they feel they can no longer stand it. There is strong talk now of voting against a proposition to "dig up" heavier assessments which are a drain on the purses of the miners in these other fields.

This dissatisfaction and unrest has been growing for some time. The international organization has apparently reached that point where it can not much longer finance the strike, and the appeals for aid are not meeting with favorable response.

The men on strike are discouraged. They are refusing now to swallow the glowing promises of union leaders who have not made good in their previous predictions. Day by day they see the coal coming out of the mines and know that their places have been taken by men who will work and who are not under the thumb of agitators and would-be leaders. They realize the outlook for success is not promising. A great majority of them would go back to work within 24 hours if they were not afraid of the "black hand" that is held over them. They would sooner be a live striker on $3 a week than lie on a slab in the morgue.

The high officials of the United Mine Workers of America are convinced that the organization has conducted a losing fight in Colorado. They know it, but will not admit it, and are whistling to keep up their courage. Vice President Frank J. Hayes knows it and discreetly keeps away from the strike zone. The men on strike know it. The people who view conditions by and large know it. The only thing left is for the union leaders to howl and scream and vilify and condemn officers of the law, pass resolutions, and send telegrams to Congressmen, and, as Gov. Ammons has said, "lie and misrepresent facts."

Under my leave to print I extend the following articles from the Home Defender of June, 1914:

WILL THE NATIONAL HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES YIELD TO ORGANIZED LABOR?—ORGANIZED LABOR'S SCORNFUL DEMANDS ON LEGISLATORS—SEEKS EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGES AT HANDS OF CONGRESS THAT WOULD LEGALIZE THE "PEACEFUL PICKETING" OF THE COLORADO COAL FIELDS—EVERY MAN'S HOME HIS CASTLE WILL NO LONGER BE TRUE WHEN LABOR UNIONS ARE ABOVE THE LAW—WHAT THE UNIONS SEEK IS CLEARLY SET FORTH IN GOMPERS'S TESTIMONY BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON JUDICIARY—HE SEEKS TO PUT UNORGANIZED LABOR UNDER THE BAN.

Much of the time of every Congress is taken up with bills and discussions on questions relating to labor, and the time of some of the committees is largely occupied in hearing complaints made by organized labor against existing laws, and in listening to their demands that organized labor shall be taken out of the category of those called upon to obey laws as other citizens are called upon to do. At this time there is pending what is called the "omnibus trust bill." It is a bill attempting to treat with every phase of the trust problem. Eight or nine sections are called the labor sections, as they deal with some phase of the labor situation now under the various statutes.

The public generally are especially interested in the several sections intended to limit the power of courts to issue injunctions, but the limitation touches only cases wherein organized labor has an interest, so the limitations may well be said to concern labor only. Injunctive proceedings have been called into activity in labor disputes when some protection was necessary to prevent injury to the property or property rights of the applicant. Property rights include the right to do business freely and without intimidation, and the right of an individual to labor when and where and under such conditions as he might determine.

The pending bill attempts to limit the right of courts to thus come to the relief of those whose property or property rights are endangered except in certain cases. It says that "no restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work, or from recommending or persuading others by peaceful means so to do, or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to quit work, or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute."

Under this vicious section a man's home will no longer be his castle. Before it and around it may gather strikers in any number, under the pretense of seeking information, and the owner or occupant of the house can get no relief, unless he resorts to the shotgun process. Another crowd may gather near his store or other place of business, and advise, urge, and, if needed, threaten those who want to buy or do business; but as long as they do not commit any act of violence they can not be interfered with by the courts. In short, the business man, the employer, the man who wants to work, is denied all relief, but the man who belongs to a labor union can molest, interfere with the rights of everybody else unchecked.

Practically, the bill puts all unorganized labor under the ban. It is not intended to act in the interest of labor as a whole, only such labor as belongs to and is governed by the rules of some union. The Sherman law was aimed at all organizations or combinations acting any way in restraint of trade. It does not single out any branch of business and make it subject to the provisions of the law, but puts all combinations that act in restraint of trade on one common footing. The Clayton bill, now pending, attempts to provide that organized labor may act in restraint of trade to its heart's content and yet be subject to no law.

In the same issue appeared the following:

DEMOCRATS BID FOR LABOR VOTE—AT LAST MOMENT THEY ARRANGE A COMPROMISE WITH GOMPERS AND MORRISON UNDER WHICH THEY HOPE TO HOLD THE VOTE OF ORGANIZED LABOR WITHOUT VOTING AWAY ENOUGH OF THE RIGHTS OF UNORGANIZED LABOR TO LOSE THEM THEIR SEATS—HOW WILL IT WORK?

As this issue of the Home Defender is going to press information comes that the Democrats in the House have agreed with Messrs. Gompers and Morrison on a clause in the antitrust act, which is drawn to give the labor unions exemption from the laws without boldly saying as much. The compromise will suit no one, for if it confers immunity on the labor leaders for dynamiting, insurrection, and anarchy, or the plotting of the same, it will be opposed by every right-minded man; while if it fails to confer such immunity it will mean nothing to the agitators who have sought such exemption. Nothing in the law now prevents such organizations from "carrying out the legitimate objects thereof." What they are after is permission to carry out "illegitimate" objects. However, the compromise is as follows:

"That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, and such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, shall not be construed or held to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

In further extension of my remarks I insert the headlines which preceded an article in the April issue of the Home Defender, and the gentleman from Washington, Mr. JOHNSON, asserts that these are the people he really founded this paper to get at and to defend the homes of the country from them. Here are the headlines:

I. W. W. raids on churches and anarchistic demonstration in New York originated in the Ferrer School of Anarchy, with the approval of Haywood and Goldman—Revolutionary leaders have seized the opportunity to dramatize discontent with the hope of repeating the Haymarket riots—Mayor Mitchel's passiveness condemned by one of his own men.

Now, I want further to insert a portion of a speech made by my colleague in Congress on April 28, 1913, in which he mentions Vice President Marshall, "Old Hoss" Wayland, Victor Berger, Theodore Roosevelt, Bill Haywood, "the food poisoner" Ettor, and Jane Addams as coworkers, but as, in reality, retarding brotherhood.

I am inserting these articles just to show the membership of this House and the readers of the RECORD that the fact of my colleague gagging when the name of Pinchot is mentioned does not necessarily prove anything.

I hope that the United States will soon return to a tariff wall—a reasonable, rational, expert tariff wall—high enough to guarantee protection, and then I hope that we will reenforce that wall with another protective wall against undesirable immigration.

With the first wall you protect the man who invests his capital, makes the goods, or grows the product, and provides the American standard of living. With the other wall, you protect the man who is on the job—you take care of the foreigners who are here, and you cut down the influx of undesirables from the south of Europe, against whom we have "conserved" all that we used to offer freely to the people from the north of Europe.

Why are we surprised that they begin to hate this country before they can find any reason to love it? Is it any wonder that these serf-born hordes quickly become the dupes and disciples of such vicious agitators as Bill Haywood and his platform of the Industrial Workers of the World—"no concern as to questions of right and wrong; no terms with employers; destruction and bloody revolution"? It will take not only our tariff wall and an immigration wall, but a penitentiary wall to stop this kind of treason.

Why are we surprised? How can we be surprised at the red-flag movement when Vice President Marshall, in an address at New York, undertakes to warn the rich, and only succeeds in striking a note that gives the socialists more sympathy than they have had since their prophet "Old Hoss" Wayland, of the Appeal to Reason, ran afoul of the Mann law and committed suicide, and more good cheer than they ever enjoyed since their disciple, Victor Berger, left Congress and expatriated himself in their eyes by purchasing an upholstered mahogany-finished motor boat.

Roosevelt did not stand at Armageddon. He stood at Chicago and preached near-socialism, almost revolution, contempt for law, and doctrines that lead to destruction.

Haywood waves the red flag at Paterson, N. J., and preaches anarchy and sabotage. Ettor advises the striking waiters to poison the food of the rich. Jane Addams wants pensions for everybody. All are preaching the universal brotherhood of man. All have different motives. In trying to save the country they are doing much to destroy it. They are teaching employees to actually hate those who employ them. They seem to have forgotten that the universal brotherhood must include the 900,000,000 people of China, Japan, and India. In this great progressive wave, will these seething hordes come up to our level or will our 100,000,000 drop to theirs, and when?

My friend, Mr. SISSON, of Mississippi, sees the peril, as his address of this forenoon clearly shows. He speaks his convictions, but I dare, in my weak and humble way, to warn not only the gentleman from Mississippi, but the honorable the Vice President of the United States and the honorable the President of the United States—who by coming on this floor has expressed a desire to take part in this debate—that every time an industry of this country is slaughtered or an American citizen is made to compete with a 9-cent Japanese, that sad day is hastened, for, my friends, the great international brotherhood with its international red flag, with its fatherless and churchless children, with its collectivism and its 57 varieties of impossible dreams, will drag us down ten thousand degrees before it can lift us one tittle. For your attention, I thank you, gentlemen. [Loud applause.]

STATEMENT AMENDED.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend the statement of mine in the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings, in the closing of the tariff debate. In the crush attendant on the closing of the tariff debate last night I seem to have permitted a lapsus linguæ, or more strictly speaking a "lapsus pencilibus." I spoke of the noble and generous Jane Addams as desiring pensions for all persons. I meant, instead, to refer to the Member from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], who only yesterday introduced a bill to provide old-age pensions of $10 each for all persons over 65 years.

It was not my desire to criticize either Miss Addams or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY], but to show that they, in connection with Vice President MARSHALL; former President Roosevelt; the Industrial Workers of the World leader, Bill Haywood; and the food poisoner, Ettor, are all striving—each with different motives—for the great brotherhood of man, but each one setting back this movement thousands of degrees.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago when the attendance in the Committee of the Whole, which is considering a bill that is most vital in its importance, and concerning which there is much doubt as to what it will produce for the 11 Western States, was under consideration by paragraphs, the attendance having run down to about 20, I made the point of order of no quorum. As is almost invariably the case when conservationists get together, efforts were made to back up this or that statement by reading from the hearing certain statements of Mr. Gifford Pinchot, whose residence, I believe, is now claimed to be in the State of Pennsylvania. Out West we have had a great deal of hardship and suffering as a result of statements and theories and dream-book observations by Mr. Pinchot. A few days ago reference was made to a conservation congress held in the city of Washington, and as reference was made to that and some quotations from Mr. Pinchot given, I could not help but think that the situation in that conservation congress last winter was the same as in the Halls of Congress here to-day. In that conservation congress, when they were undertaking to pass some water-power resolutions—which, by the way, did not pass—there were present as delegates from the District of Columbia 162 men, from the State of Washington 10 men, from Oregon 8 men, from New Jersey 60 or 70 men, and from New York 120, or something like that. They adopted resolutions telling what future generations shall do with what had been given to our Western States. Almost the same thing is happening here in the discussion of these four so-called conservation bills, for as soon as you get through with this one you will have the ore-leasing bill. I am absolutely astonished and surprised at the attitude of some western Representatives—some of whom were pioneers in those Western States and have helped to build up those States with what was given them in their enabling acts, and under which they urged and invited people to go west and settle with them.

But, Mr. Chairman, since so many are so prone to quote at every opportunity the words of that "great god bud," Gifford Pinchot, I want in opposition to read a few lines from resolutions adopted unanimously by the Third Annual Conference of Western Governors, held in the city of Denver on April 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of this year, as follows:

WHAT THE WEST WANTS.

[Resolutions adopted unanimously by the Third Annual Conference of Western Governors held in Denver, Colo., April 7 to 11, 1914.]

We, the members of the western governors' conference, in convention assembled at Denver, Colo., April 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, 1914, do hereby adopt the following resolutions:

CONSERVATION.

We believe in conservation—in sane conservation. We believe that the All-Wise Creator placed the vast resources of this Nation here for the use and benefit of all the people—generations past, present, and future—and while we believe due consideration and protection should be given to the rights of those who come hereafter, we insist that the people of this day and age should be given every reasonable opportunity to develop our wonderful resources and put them to a beneficial use.

STATE CONTROL.

That it is the duty of each and every State to adopt such laws as will make for true conservation of our resources, prevent monopoly, and render the greatest good to the greatest number; and that as rapidly as the States prepare themselves to carry out such a policy of conservation the Federal Government should withdraw its supervision and turn the work over to the States.

Does anyone contend for a moment that any of these so-called conservation bills contemplate at any time turning any of these resources back to our Western States? And a little farther on these resolutions read:

WATER POWER.

Whereas Congress has declared "the water of all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply, upon the public lands and not navigable, shall remain and be held free from the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes," we insist the Federal Government has no lawful authority to exercise control over the water of a State through ownership of public lands.

We maintain the waters of a State belong to the people of the State, and that the States should be left free to develop water-power possibilities and should receive fully the revenues and other benefits derived from such development.

Mr. Chairman, I have thought that the least that this Congress could do in the interest of 11 great Western States was to pay a little bit of attention to these bills as they are being put through. I have three times made the point of order of no quorum when the attendance had gotten down to a pitiful degree of smallness. I know what will happen when the final vote comes. Members will come in here and vote for one more bill to press more conservation down on the West, and they will not know the details of the bill.

In regard to the remarks of my colleague in his political speech, just made, I have not the time and do not care to take up the time of the House in reply. It is but proper for me to say that I started—and I am very proud of the fact that I did start—a small monthly paper, devoted to attacking the principles of red-flag socialism and to opposition to the dangerous Industrial Workers of the World. So far as I edited that paper, I stand by every word that I put in it. I wish I had had the power, the time, and the means to extend its influence throughout the United States, but I found on coming here to Washington, D. C., that the expenses were such that I could not maintain the paper, and I disposed of it. What has appeared in it since should not be credited to me. What has been read here I did not write and did not say. I thank the committee for its attention.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman name the date of his disposal of the paper?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, returning now for a moment to the bill and the particular amendment we ought to be considering, you will find that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming is to strike out of paragraph 2 that part under which the lessee may be prohibited, without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, from selling to any one consumer more than 50 per cent of the total output of his plant.

A few days ago, when this bill was first up for consideration, I made some observations with respect to the legal aspect of some features of the bill. I stated what I had every reason to believe was the law—at least it was the law when last I took occasion to ascertain the law. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], in charge of the bill, a most delightful and distinguished Member of the House, rose and with a superbly majestic wave of his hand disposed of my proposition and my statement by saying that it was made so much waste paper by a very late decision of the Supreme Court in the Chandler-Dunbar case. Now, Mr. Chairman, it does not matter how gentlemen may quibble, how they may long to effectuate their desires, the fact remains that almost every paragraph of this bill is absolutely in open defiance of the Constitution of the United States. Now, these provisions can be so changed as to make them in harmony with the powers of Congress, but until so changed the bill can never be made effective. This particular part of the paragraph which the amendment offered to strike out is one which proposes that the Secretary of the Interior may say whether or not there shall be sold to A more than 50 per cent of the water power at one place, or to B or to C, and thus in effect disburse it arbitrarily as he sees fit. When did Congress ever have the power to meddle with the interior business exclusively within a State? This is not interstate business, it is not commerce. I consent at once to the proposition that if the Secretary had been clothed with power to exercise certain supervision over electric energy when transported into two or more States, Congress would be within its powers. This, however, covers not only interstate business, but business absolutely and entirely within a State.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I can not yield because I have only a few minutes. If I could obtain an extension of time I should be delighted to yield. So after the gentleman had taken his seat the other day I betook myself to the library to find what this new decision was that had made waste paper of the Constitution of the United States; that had made waste paper of all the decisions of our Supreme Court. I have it with me here now. The Chandler-Dunbar case reported in Two hundred and twenty-ninth United States, page 53. Let us see what it decides and what it holds.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I would like to yield and, perhaps, can when I make this statement, but not now. Congress decided by the passing of an act to construct some new locks at the Soo. In the act Congress specifically stated that all the water of that river was needed for purposes of navigation. Congress then authorized condemnation proceedings to acquire a strip of land bordering the stream and to acquire certain other properties.

The Chandler-Dunbar Co., under a revocable license previously secured, had constructed and was operating a water-power plant in the stream. This company was a riparian owner, as such claiming that it must be compensated for exclusion from the use of the water power inherent in the falls and rapids of the St. Marys River, whether the flow of the river be larger than the needs of navigation or not. Quoting from the decision:

From the foregoing it will be seen that the controlling questions are, first, whether the Chandler-Dunbar Co. has any private property in the water-power capacity of the rapids and falls of the St. Marys River which has been "taken," and for which compensation must be made under the fifth amendment to the Constitution; and, second, if so, what is the extent of its water power right and how shall the compensation be measured?

* * * * * * *

The technical title to the beds of the navigable rivers of the United States is either in the States in which the rivers are situated or in the owners of the land bordering upon such rivers. Whether in one or the other is a question of local law. (Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1, 31; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605, 624, 632; Scott v. Lattig, 227 U. S., 229.) Upon the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union the bed of the St. Marys River passed to the State, and under the law of that State the conveyance of a tract of land upon a navigable river carries the title to the middle thread. (Webber v. The Pope Marquette, etc., 62 Mich., 626; Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U. S., 141, 163; United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co., 209 U. S., 447.)

The technical title of the Chandler-Dunbar Co., therefore, includes the bed of the river opposite its upland on the bank to the middle thread of the stream, being the boundary line at that point between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. Over this bed flows about two-thirds of the volume of water constituting the falls and rapids of the St. Marys River. By reason of that fact and the ownership of the shore the company's claim is that it is the owner of the river and of the inherent power in the falls and rapids, subject only to the public right of navigation. While not denying that this right of navigation is the dominating right, yet the claim is that the United States in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce may not exclude the rights of riparian owners to construct in the river and upon their own submerged lands such appliances as are necessary to control and use the current for commercial purposes, provided only that such structures do not impede or hinder navigation, and that the flow of the stream is not so diminished as to leave less than every possible requirement of navigation, present and future. This claim of a proprietary right in the bed of the river and in the flow of the stream over that bed, to the extent that such flow is in excess of the wants of navigation constitutes the ground upon which the company asserts that a necessary effect of the act of March 3, 1909, and of the judgment of condemnation in the court below, is a taking from it of a property right or interest of great value, for which, under the fifth amendment, compensation must be made.

* * * * * * *

This title of the owner of fast land upon the shore of a navigable river to the bed of the river is at best a qualified one. It is a title which inheres in the ownership of the shore and, unless reserved or excluded by implication, passed with it as a shadow follows a substance, although capable of distinct ownership. It is subordinate to the public right of navigation, and however helpful in protecting the owner against the acts of third parties, is of no avail against the exercise of the great and absolute power of Congress over the improvement of navigable rivers. That power of use and control comes from the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations. It includes navigation and subjects every navigable river to the control of Congress. All means having some positive relation to the end in view which are not forbidden by some other provision of the Constitution are admissible. If, in the judgment of Congress, the use of the bottom of the river is proper for the purpose of placing therein structures in aid of navigation, it is not thereby taking private property for a public use, for the owner's title was in its very nature subject to that use in the interest of public navigation. If its judgment be that structures placed in the river and upon such submerged land are an obstruction or hindrance to the proper use of the river for purposes of navigation, it may require their removal and forbid the use of the bed of the river by the owner in any way which in its judgment is injurious to the dominant right of navigation. So, also, it may permit the construction and maintenance of tunnels under or bridges over the river and may require the removal of every such structure placed there with or without its license, the element of contract out of the way, which it shall require to be removed or altered as an obstruction to navigation. In Gilman v. Philadelphia (3 Wall., 713, 724) this court said:

"Commerce includes navigation. The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from a State other than those in which they lie. For this purpose they are the public property of the Nation and subject to all the requisite legislation by Congress. This necessarily includes the power to keep them open and free from any obstructions to their navigation interposed by the States or otherwise, to remove such obstructions when they exist, and to provide, by such sanctions as they may deem proper, against the occurrance of the evil and for the punishment of offenders. For these purposes Congress possesses all the powers which existed in the States before the adoption of the National Constitution and which have always existed in the Parliament in England."

Note the discussion by the court is solely in reference to navigation. It is stated with great clearness that Congress has complete control over navigable waters—not to regulate private business thereon or connected therewith, but for purposes of navigation, and for those purposes alone. At every step and in every statement the court explicitly restricts Federal regulation to navigation needs. Observe in the quoted decision of Gilman v. Philadelphia (3 Wall., 713) how the court there so clearly restricts Federal power over navigable waters when it says:

The power to regulate commerce comprehends the control for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters. * * * For this purpose they are the public property of the Nation and subject to all the requisite legislation.

Could court or law more clearly announce that the control of the Federal Government over navigable waters within a State is strictly limited to purposes of navigation or commerce? If any Member is sufficiently interested, let him turn to the record of the proceedings on that former occasion when this matter was up and he will find this is the exact proposition I laid down as the law. I am indebted to the gentleman for citing this case, which reaffirms the law as I stated it some days ago.

But let me quote some more from this same illuminating decision:

That riparian owners upon public navigable rivers have, in addition to the rights common to the public, certain rights to the use and enjoyment of the stream, which are incident to such ownership of the bank must be conceded. These additional rights are not dependent upon title to the soil over which the river flows, but are incident to ownership upon the bank. Among these rights of use and enjoyment is the right, as against other riparian owners, to have the stream come to them substantially in its natural state, both in quantity and quality. They have also the right of access to deep water, and when not forbidden by public law may construct for this purpose wharves, docks, and piers in the shallow water of the shore. But every such structure in the water of a navigable river is subordinate to the right of navigation and subject to the obligation to suffer the consequences of the improvement of navigation and must be removed if Congress in the assertion of its power over navigation shall determine that their continuance is detrimental to the public interest in the navigation of the river. (Gibson v. United States, 166 U. S., 269; Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S., 635.) It is for Congress to decide what is and what is not an obstruction to navigation. (Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 18 How., 421; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S., 364; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605.)

And, again—

Upon what principle can it be said that in requiring the removal of the development works which were in the river upon sufferance Congress has taken private property for public use without compensation? In deciding that a necessity existed for absolute control of the river at the rapids Congress has, of course, excluded until it changes the law every such construction as a hindrance to its plans and purposes for the betterment of navigation. The qualified title to the bed of the river affords no ground for any claim of a right to construct and maintain therein any structure which Congress has by the act of 1909 decided in effect to be an obstruction to navigation and a hindrance to its plans for improvement. That title is absolutely subordinate to the right of navigation and no right of private property would have been invaded if such submerged lands were occupied by structures in aid of navigation or kept free from such obstructions in the interest of navigation. (Scranton v. Wheeler, supra; Hawkins Light House cases, 39 Fed., 83.) We need not consider whether the entire flow of the river is necessary for the purposes of navigation or whether there is a surplus which is to be paid for if the Chandler-Dunbar Co. is to be excluded from the commercial use of that surplus. The answer is found in the fact that Congress has determined that the stream from the upland taken to the international boundary is necessary for the purposes of navigation. That determination operates to exclude from the river forever the structures necessary for the commercial use of the water power. That it does not deprive the Chandler-Dunbar Co. of private property rights follows from the considerations before stated.

It is said that the twelfth section of the act of 1909 authorizes the Secretary of War to lease upon terms agreed upon any excess of water power which results from the conservation of the flow of the river and the works which the Government may construct. This, it is said, is a taking of private property for commercial uses and not for the improvement of navigation. But, aside from the exclusive public purpose declared by the eleventh section of the act, the twelfth section declares that the conservation of the flow of the river is "primarily for the benefit of navigation and incidentally for the purpose of having the water power developed either for the direct use of the United States or by lease * * * through the Secretary of War."

If the primary purpose is legitimate, we can see no sound objection to leasing any excess of power over the needs of the Government. The practice is not unusual in respect to similar public works constructed by State governments. In Kaukauna Co. v. Green Bay, etc., Canal (142 U. S., 254, 273), respecting a Wisconsin act to which this objection was made, the court said:

"But if in the erection of a public dam for a recognized public purpose there is necessarily produced a surplus of water which may properly be used for manufacturing purposes there is no sound reason why the State may not retain to itself the power of controlling or disposing of such water as an incident of its right to make such improvement. Indeed, it might become very necessary to retain the disposition of it in its own hands in order to preserve at all times a sufficient supply for the purposes of navigation. If the riparian owners were allowed to tap the pond at different places and draw off the water for their own use, serious consequences might arise not only in connection with the public demand for the purposes of navigation, but between the riparian owners themselves, as to the proper proportion each was entitled to draw—controversies which could only be avoided by the State reserving to itself the immediate supervision of the entire supply. As there is no need of the surplus running to waste, there was nothing objectionable in permitting the State to let out the use of it to private parties and thus reimburse itself for the expenses of the improvement."

It is at best not clear how the Chandler-Dunbar Co. can be heard to object to the selling of any excess of water power which may result from the construction of such controlling or remedial works as shall be found advisable for the improvement of navigation, inasmuch as it had no property right in the river which has been "taken." It has, therefore, no interest whether the Government permit the excess of power to go to waste or made the means of producing some return upon the great expenditure.

Here you have the whole case. These are the facts. This is the decision so valiantly relied upon by the bold champion of this bill. Surely he had never read this case. He is far too intelligent after reading to make any such claims for it. We must conclude he has been imposed upon by some one whose power to reason suddenly stopped. Not only does the case fail to sustain the gentleman or his bill but actually sustains our criticism of the bill as far as it has any bearing at all. Observe the facts: Congress passes an act that says all the water in the St. Marys River is needed for purposes of navigation; that the private property on and along said stream, including a private water-power plant, shall be condemned; that the surplus water going over a Government dam incidental to the primary effort to erect structures for the improvement of navigation may be turned into electrical energy and sold by the Government. The court holds the power of Congress is supreme over navigable waters for the purposes of navigation; that private persons by acquiring riparian rights can not secure a property interest in a water power as against an act of Congress stating all the water is needed for navigation.

Of course this is the law. Of course, also, this case does not in any way whisper or suggest that Congress has power to override State laws by making rules of its own to regulate private business within the State, even though that private business is the selling or using of water power developed on land a part of the public domain.

The Chandler-Dunbar case, from the first page to the last, contains not a line or a syllable that bears at all on the power of the Congress to legislate as provided in the bill. Now, if the gentleman will indulge me a little further, may I call the attention to the powers of Congress as decided by the Supreme Court, and which do stand to-day as they stood a few years ago, and which have not been made so much waste paper.

It is, of course, fundamental to state that the powers possessed by Congress are not general, but confined to those enumerated in the Constitution. The powers of the Congress are those surrendered by the States, or rather by the people of the United States. All powers not specifically surrendered are still retained either by the States or by the people of the Union. I challenge any gentleman to point out in the Federal Constitution any authority for Congress to go into the business primarily of controlling water powers operated by private persons or corporations, or controlling public-service corporations whose business is wholly within a State.

A decision of our Supreme Court, directly in point and exceedingly valuable in construing the legal effect of the terms of this bill, is a very recent one, as well as one of the utmost importance. I refer to the case of Kansas against Colorado, reported in Two hundred and sixth United States, page 46.

The State of Colorado, directly and through certain corporations authorized by it, was utilizing the waters of the Arkansas River in the work of reclaiming or irrigating arid lands. This same river flows through the State of Kansas, after leaving Colorado. The State of Kansas brought an action to restrain Colorado and the said corporations from so using the waters of the Arkansas River, because such use prevented the natural and customary flow of the river. The United States intervened, claiming the right to use the waters of that river to irrigate the public domain and Indian reservations. The river was not actually navigable, either in Colorado or Kansas, and no claim was made that the interests of navigation were involved.

So it is seen in that case the State of Colorado for irrigation and reclamation purposes was utilizing a large part of the water of the Arkansas River. The State of Kansas desired that those waters should be transferred on down within its own borders for a similar purpose, and they claimed that Kansas had a right to receive the water with its flow practically unimpeded. They brought an action and asked the Government to restrain Colorado from using the waters of the river.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman just yield for a brief interruption there? I will not be tedious.

Mr. MILLER. I will yield.

Mr. CLINE. But did not the Government in that very case decide that had the Government sought to intervene for the purpose of protecting navigation that then the Government would have had a standing in the court?

Mr. MILLER. Absolutely; and the gentleman gives further testimony as to the law. The court first clearly defines the powers of Congress over the waters of streams within the State, and then holds that the control of such streams is vested in the State, excepting only for navigation purposes. Quoting from the syllabus:

The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people; and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State.

And there it shall remain forever.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will make his question very short.

Mr. FERGUSSON. I will. Does not the gentleman recognize that this bill deals with Government land situated within the States?

Mr. MILLER. My dear sir, I am pleased the question was asked. I was about to come to it. The fact that the United States Government owns some of the land can not give it a single power not granted by the Constitution. It has no greater power by reason of that ownership than I have or has the gentleman from New Mexico. Congress has only those powers which the States surrendered; it is not possessed of powers except those which were given by the States. Among those we have the power to regulate commerce, and the court has held that that power includes control over navigation. But we can not step beyond that. There is no question of navigation involved in the pending bill. Ninety-nine per cent of these water items are beyond the limits of navigation. There is no question of interstate commerce. It is simply a square industrial enterprise by the United States, and, as was so well stated by the gentleman from Wyoming the other day, this is the greatest usurpation of centralized power ever displayed in the history of our Nation. It surpasses the claims of the most ultra Federalist of ancient days. It is also one of the greatest enterprises of a business nature ever undertaken by a private or by a public corporation. And do not forget, it is being undertaken by the United States Government.

Discussing the power of Congress, the court said:

This amendment, the tenth, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, "we the people of the United States," not the people of one State, but the people of all the States, and Article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the States not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the National Government by the Constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted, they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated.

Discussing the right of the State to control the waters of streams within its borders, the court said:

Although this power of changing the common law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each State, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its waters; so far at least as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property; second, that it is limited by the superior power of the General Government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that Government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable water courses of the country even against any State action.

It follows from this that if in the present case the National Government was asserting, as against either Kansas or Colorado, that the appropriation for the purposes of irrigation of the waters of the Arkansas was affecting the navigability of the stream, it would become our duty to determine the truth of the charge. But the Government makes no such contention. On the contrary, it distinctly asserts that the Arkansas River is not now and never was practically navigable beyond Fort Gibson, in the Indian Territory, and nowhere claims that any appropriation of the waters by Kansas or Colorado affects its navigability.

It rests its petition of intervention upon its alleged duty of legislating for the reclamation of arid lands; alleges that in or near the Arkansas River, as it runs through Kansas and Colorado, are large tracts of those lands; that the National Government is itself the owner of many thousands of acres; that it has the right to make such legislative provision as in its judgment is needful for the reclamation of all these arid lands and for that purpose to appropriate the accessible waters.

In support of the main proposition it is stated in the brief of its counsel:

That the doctrine of riparian rights is inapplicable to conditions prevailing in the arid region; that such doctrine, if applicable in said region, would prevent the sale, reclamation, and cultivation of the public arid lands and defeat the policy of the Government in respect thereto; that the doctrine which is applicable to conditions in said arid region, and which prevails therein, is that the waters of natural streams may be used to irrigate and cultivate arid lands, whether riparian or nonriparian, and that the priority of appropriation of such waters and the application of the same for beneficial purposes establishes a prior and superior right.

In other words, the determination of the rights of the two States inter esse in regard to the flow of waters in the Arkansas River is subordinate to a superior right on the part of the National Government to control the whole system of the reclamation of arid lands. That involves the question whether the reclamation of arid lands is one of the powers granted to the General Government. As heretofore stated, the constant declaration of this court from the beginning is that this Government is one of enumerated powers.

Again:

But it is useless to pursue the inquiry further in this direction. It is enough for the purposes of this case that each State has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters. (Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet., 367; Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 9 How., 471; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S., 324; St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S., 566; Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S., 61; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S., 371; Kaukauna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co., 142 U. S., 254; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1; Water Power Co. v. Water Commissioner, 168 U. S., 349; Kean v. Calumet Canal Co., 190 U. S., 452.) In Barney v. Keokuk, supra, Mr. Justice Bradley said (p. 338):

"And since this court, in the case of The Genesee Chief (12 id., 443), has declared that the Great Lakes and other navigable waters of the country, above as well as below the flow of the tide, are in the strictest sense entitled to the denomination of navigable waters and amenable to the admiralty jurisdiction, there seems to be no sound reasons for adhering to the old rule as to the proprietorship of the beds and shores of such waters. It properly belongs to the States by their inherent sovereignty, and the United States has wisely abstained from extending (if it could extend) its survey and grants beyond the limits of high water."

Congress clearly understood the limitations of its powers when it passed the reclamation act. In that it clearly recognized the paramount right of the State to control by law the waters within its borders. All the rules and laws governing the usage of water for irrigation purposes are State laws. Congress never assumed—because prior to the present hour it had more sense than to do so—never assumed to override the superior right of the State to control its own watercourses. Section 8 of the reclamation act is as follows:

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder; and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof: Provided, That the right to the use of the water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

The power of Congress to legislate respecting interstate commerce has been the subject of numerous decisions. It can be finally stated that the power of Congress does not go beyond, and is strictly confined to, commerce of an interstate nature. A State does not have authority to pass a law that interferes with or puts a burden upon interstate commerce. Such is the holding in the Shreveport case of recent date. Similarly, Congress has no authority to prescribe any rule or procedure respecting commerce unless it has some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated.

A recent and a highly instructive decision is that of the Supreme Court in Adair v. United States (208 U. S., 161). In this case Congress had made it a crime for a railway official engaged in interstate commerce to discharge an employee because he was a member of a labor union. Adair was convicted in Kentucky and appealed. In the opinion the court said:

Manifestly, any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. But what possible legal or logical connection is there between an employee's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce? Such relation to a labor organization can not have in itself and in the eye of the law any bearing upon the commerce with which the employee is connected by his labor and services. Labor associations, we assume, are organized for the general purpose of improving or bettering the conditions and conserving the interests of its members as wage earners—an object entirely legitimate and to be commended rather than condemned. But surely those associations as labor organizations have nothing to do with interstate commerce as such. One who engages in the service of an interstate carrier will, it must be assumed, faithfully perform his duty, whether he be a member or not a member of a labor organization. His fitness for the position in which he labors and his diligence in the discharge of his duties can not in law or sound reason depend in any degree upon his being or not being a member of a labor organization. It can not be assumed that his fitness is assured or his diligence increased by such membership, or that he is less fit or less diligent because of his not being a member of such an organization. It is the employee as a man and not as a member of a labor organization who labors in the service of an interstate carrier.

Looking alone at the words of the statute for the purpose of ascertaining its scope and effect, and of determining its validity, we hold that there is no such connection between interstate commerce and membership in a labor organization as to authorize Congress to make it a crime against the United States for an agent of an interstate carrier to discharge an employee because of such membership on his part. If such a power exists in Congress, it is difficult to perceive why it might not, by absolute regulation, require interstate carriers, under penalties, to employ in the conduct of its interstate business only members of labor organizations, or only those who are not members of such organizations—a power which could not be recognized as existing under the Constitution of the United States. No such rule of criminal liability as that to which we have referred can be regarded as in any just sense a regulation of interstate commerce. We need scarcely repeat what this court has more than once said—that the power to regulate interstate commerce, great and paramount as that power is, can not be exerted in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the Constitution.

Having in mind, therefore, these clearly enunciated principles by our Supreme Court, let us apply them to the paragraphs of the bill. Only a brief glance is necessary to disclose clearly how all constitutional limitation has been violated. The bill prescribes rules and regulations to operate in the various States in open conflict with both State rights and State laws. In paragraph 1 the limitation of 50 years would be in open conflict with the laws of such a State as Wisconsin, since the laws of that State say the right to operate the water power is perpetual, subject to the rules and regulations that law prescribes.

The last half of paragraph 2 is ridiculously beyond the power of Congress, and paragraph 3 is the high watermark of impotent aspirations wallowing in the network of State and Federal law.

From a dozen different angles one can view this section and from each see that it is absolutely void of legality. To illustrate, the Secretary of the Interior is given complete control over the service, charges for service, even over the issuance of stocks and bonds, of the lessee when he is doing business in two or more States. One may be doing business in two or three States and yet not be doing an interstate business. Then the Secretary is given marvelous authority to permit or prohibit combination of plants, except in certain cases. The framers of the bill assumed Congress had power to regulate water-power business entirely within a State, just as Congress has power to regulate interstate commerce. They will search through the Constitution in vain to find any authority for the powers here conferred upon the Secretary.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MILLER. I do not like to seem discourteous, but I have only a short period of time and I must hurry along.

And it seems to be entirely overlooked that there exist States with sovereign powers. That will be found out sometime. Now, it is an easy matter to change these provisions so as to bring them within the limits of the Constitution. You can do it on the contract basis, but you can not do it in any other way.

Now, referring to the question just asked by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON], if the United States, by its possession of the land, can not do upon it anything it pleases, I will say, of course it can not; it can not do anything upon that piece of land except to sell it or lease it and control interstate commerce respecting it. But this bill has nothing to do with navigation or interstate commerce. If any gentleman will point out to me any place or any part in this bill dealing with navigation or with commerce, then I am prepared to modify my views. Nay, possibly some gentleman will suggest that this very paragraph does that, wherein it says as follows:

SEC. 3. That in case of the development, generation, transmission, and use of power or energy under such a lease in a Territory, or in two or more States, the regulation and control of service and of charges for service to consumers and of the issuance of stock and bonds by the lessee is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior.

There are some words which possibly might give a suggestion that where power is being transmitted from one State into another, thus becoming interstate commerce, the terms of this paragraph apply. I grant that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. O'SHAUNESSY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 14155. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled 'An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State normal school thereon, and for a public park.'"

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5574) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 1657) providing for second homestead and desert-land entries, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 1698) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MILLER. How much time did I have, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I have two minutes in which to answer for the committee. I was crowded out by a side issue here.

Mr. MILLER. I would really like to have five minutes more if I can have it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Minnesota has not taken much time, and this is a very important feature of this discussion.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I can not consent to open this section again if the committee is not willing to give me two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee on the pending amendment for two minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I shall not object if the gentleman from Oklahoma will allow the gentleman from Minnesota to have some additional time.

Mr. FERRIS. I really hope the gentleman from Minnesota will not ask for another five minutes. The committee has not kept any time to itself.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is presenting an argument in which we are interested.

Mr. FERRIS. He is presenting an argument that has been presented on every water-power proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was not discussed the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether there is objection to the request submitted by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], that he may address the committee for two minutes on the pending amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] desires more time?

Mr. MILLER. I do; and I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I appreciate the position of the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I would like some more time on the next paragraph. I do not propose to be shut off.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no disposition to shut the gentleman off.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], that he may address the committee for two minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the substance of the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota is that the Federal Government has not the right to do with its own property whatsoever it will. I assert that both in law, in fact, and in reason the Federal Government has the right to do on its property anywhere in the United States what it desires to do. With that, I shall pass to the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The specific amendment which was offered more than an hour ago by the gentleman from Wyoming is on page 3, line 17, to strike out lines 17, 18, 19, and part of 20, which in effect would give the water-power company the right to sell all of the power produced to one concern or to one person or lessee. It is patent that that should not be permitted. The committee thought there ought to be some restraint upon the water-power company in disposing of its product in the public interest.

In other words, the water-power company, if the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming is adopted, will have the right to sell its entire output, to the exclusion of local irrigation interests and local interests generally, to one concern. We ought not to permit that to be done, and the amendment ought not to be adopted. I can not think the gentleman from Wyoming wants to do that. It is clearly against the interests of his State. The amendment adopted some time ago should not have been adopted, but surely this amendment ought not to be adopted from any standpoint or any reason. The language as reported by the committee put the limitation on the amount of the water power that can be sold to a single person. The amendment of the gentleman takes that limitation off. The Secretary thinks it ought to be in. I think quite all of the authorities that came before the committee thought it ought to be in, and the entire committee thinks it ought to be in. The committee should be slow to accept amendments here that have had no consideration. Some of them may look good on their face, but will work mischief in fact. An amendment that has not been well planned and well thought out, of so sweeping importance as that of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], ought not to be agreed to, and I hope the committee will not agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the debate is closed on the entire paragraph.

Mr. MONDELL. No; only on the amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. No; on the entire paragraph and amendments thereto. There can not be any debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that under the agreement all debate upon this paragraph is exhausted.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in case of the development, generation, transmission, and use of power or energy under such a lease in a Territory, or in two or more States, the regulation and control of service and of charges for service to consumers and of the issuance of stock and bonds by the lessee is hereby conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior or committed to such body as may be provided by Federal statute: Provided, That the physical combination of plants or lines for the generation, distribution, and use of power or energy under this act or under leases given hereunder may be permitted, in the discretion of the Secretary, but combinations, agreements, arrangements, or understandings, express or implied, to limit the output of electrical energy, to restrain trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or within any one State, or to fix, maintain, or increase prices for electrical energy or service are hereby forbidden.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is in lieu of section 3, down to the first proviso on page 4, line 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3 down to the word "statute," in line 2 of page 4, and insert the following: "That all leases shall be granted upon the condition and subject to the reservation that at all times during the use and enjoyment thereof, and of the water power appropriated and used in connection therewith, the service and charges therefor, including all electric power generated or used in connection therewith, shall be subject to the regulation and control of the State within which the same is used, and subject to the fixing of the rates and charges for the use thereof and the issuance of securities by such State or under its authority."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] a few moments ago gave us an exceedingly interesting legal discussion of some of the features of this measure. I do not intend to go at length, further than I did in my opening speech, into these legal questions. Since Congress passed a bill which provided in substance that a chickadee bird, sailing through the blue sky, if he happened to pass over a point directly above a State line became interstate commerce, I have concluded that it is hardly worth while to talk about the Constitution of the United States in the discussion of any legislation in this body. [Laughter.] However, I do not think that even the gentlemen who have no regard whatever for the Constitution, who have no tolerance for the kind of Government that our fathers established and which we live under—I think the gentlemen who are perfectly willing to tear down all the pillars of the Constitution ought not to do it when it is clearly patent they can not serve any public good by doing it and will serve monopoly instead.

Now, the provision of the bill which I have proposed to strike out provides that if any part of the power developed is used in more than one State the Secretary of the Interior shall control the entire enterprise. In other words, a great enterprise might be built up and might operate for years in one State completely and satisfactorily under State control, and, having finally run a line to light one lamp across a State line, it would immediately become, like the chickadee bird under the migratory bird act, interstate commerce, subject, as to the whole concern, to regulation by the Secretary of the Interior, taking it absolutely out of the control of the people who use it, the people who are to be served.

There is some question as to the extent of the power of the Federal Government, as to just what the Federal Government may do in prescribing rules and regulations under which its public lands may be used. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is certainly right when he contends that the Federal Government, in providing rules and regulations for the use of its public lands, can not thereby legally assert a power which the Constitution does not give the Federal Government.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In other words, there are no implied powers granted to the Federal Government by reason of its ownership of land, and the courts have decided that many times. But the discretion and power of the Federal Government in laying down rules and regulations relative to the use of public lands is, I think, pretty broad.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. But those rules, which are the rules laid down by a proprietor, can not be held to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE].

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he believed, in case the Federal Government itself should build a power plant on a public domain, it would not have the right to charge the consumer of that power any price it saw fit independent of any State regulation or control?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I am not a lawyer——

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Neither am I——

Mr. MONDELL. I am inclined to think not, but I do not want to give a curbstone opinion on a proposition of that kind. We are crossing that bridge now.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I understand that that is the contention of the chairman of the committee—that, it being Federal property and being absolutely under the control of the Federal Government, the Government can do with it as it pleases.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to my friend from Colorado that I still believe in the good old-fashioned doctrine that the people of this country reserved to themselves within the municipalities all the powers that they did not expressly grant to the Federal Government, and you can not find any power anywhere in the Federal Government that is not expressed in the Federal Constitution. I do not think you will find in the Constitution any power, expressed or implied, for the Federal Government to put itself above a State in the manner suggested.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Right on that last remark of the gentleman from Wyoming, although he is not a lawyer, having, however, interpreted part of the Constitution, will he tell us what he thinks of this power:

> The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly. That includes more than public lands, I will say to the gentleman; but Congress has, of course, the right to dispose of public lands.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It does include the public lands?

Mr. MONDELL. It does include the public lands, but it includes more than public lands. No one has denied the right of the Federal Government to dispose of the public lands or to make proper rules and regulations relative to their use and their disposition.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. That is what I say.

Mr. MONDELL. But it can not use its ownership and proprietorship of the public lands as an excuse for attempting to exercise sovereignty which it does not possess. That is our contention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more. I really have not got to the discussion of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, I should like to see if we can get the time limited.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman is not going to limit time on the paragraph.

Mr. FERRIS. No; on the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the pending amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. On the amendment and the amendments to it?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; but not on the paragraph. It does not close debate on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to go into a constitutional discussion of the matter, but simply made the observations that I did, leading up to my amendment. Now, let us see what the situation is under this bill. So far as the regulation of the rates and charges of an enterprise entirely within one State is concerned, there is nothing in this bill that fixes or attempts to fix the power of the States or attempts to strengthen the power of the States. I take it, it is assumed by those who drew the bill that an enterprise wholly within a State is regulated by the State, but no effort is made to aid the State or strengthen the State in its power of control. Now, when an enterprise distributes electrical energy in two States, it is proposed, contrary to the Constitution and to our form of Government, to give the Secretary of the Interior authority to take over the entire enterprise, no matter how large it may be, and regulate it in every way.

My amendment has two purposes: First, to strengthen the power of the State over these corporations by providing that every lease shall be dependent upon the acceptance of the power of the State to control. Unless you do put some provision of that sort in the bill, if one of these enterprises or the people owning it should refuse to acknowledge the right of the State to control it, there is no way in which the Federal Government can be of any assistance in successfully issuing the power of the State. Now, I suggest to these federalistic gentlemen who want to do unconstitutional things, as they say, in the interest of the people or for the benefit of the people, why not let them surprise themselves by doing a perfectly constitutional thing which will strengthen the power of the people locally over these corporations?

My amendment first puts the people who have the right to control in such a position that if their right to control is denied the lease is canceled. Second, it provides that the control shall be in the State where the plant is located or the current used; in other words, each State would control the part of the enterprise that it had to do with. We simply leave the law and the Constitution just as they are, but we use the fact of the ownership of land by the Federal Government to strengthen the hands of the State in its control. That is the logical way to do this thing. It is infinitely more effective than the provision contained in the bill. It does help each State, and it helps all of the States where an enterprise is in more than one, and it holds over these lessees the danger of cancellation if they do not fully acknowledge the power of the State and its people to control.

Mr. RAKER. What is the object of the gentleman in having Congress pass upon the question of the handling of the appropriation of water and the connection with it?

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing in my amendment that has anything to do with the appropriation of water, except that it says that all operations under a lease and under the water right shall be subject to the control of the States. They are subject to the control of the States, but proposing to so fix these leases that the power of the Federal Government—not the power that it has no right to exercise, but the power it has the right to exercise—may be used to aid the States in their complete control of the power projects within their borders.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, when my time expired I was proceeding to read and discuss a part of section 3. Apparently the gentlemen who prepared the bill had in mind that by that language they were controlling interstate commerce. Let us see what it says:

> A lease in a territory, or in two or more States.

That does not say through two or more States. That does not say through one State into another. That says in two or more States. Now, any of us can see a thousand illustrations, where it would not be interstate commerce at all. The States of Wisconsin and Minnesota lie side by side, separated for quite a distance by the Mississippi and then by the St. Croix Rivers. There are water powers along those streams. We will say here is a power plant being constructed on the St. Croix, on Government land, one plant at one place. It has one line running into Wisconsin, delivering power there. It has another line running into Minnesota, delivering power there.

They are not doing an interstate business. They are doing business in two States. You can not give Congress the power and authority to regulate the proceedings and business of a company that is doing business in two States and not an interstate business by calling it any name you please. I fancy we can imagine cases where a concern might be doing business in three States. I can see one now. Take it up here at Harpers Ferry, where West Virginia, Maryland, and Virginia unite, with magnificent water powers right at the spot. There could be located a plant that would be doing business in three States, but never be doing an interstate business. Why, Mr. Chairman, instead of the proposition I submitted the other day having been made waste paper by the Chandler-Dunbar decision, I submit that every decision of the Supreme Court, and particularly its last expression which I read, makes absolute waste paper of three-fourths of the provisions of this bill.

Referring again to an inquiry oft repeated, Can not the United States do anything it pleases with its own lands? the answer is, Of course it can not. Gentlemen must not confuse ownership with sovereignty. Ownership does not give sovereignty. Ownership does not create sovereignty. If it did, we would all be sovereigns because we own something.

If I own a piece of land in the State of Wisconsin and build on that piece of land a water-power plant, I am subject to the laws of Wisconsin in every respect where those laws operate. Likewise, if the United States Government leases a site to an individual who builds a plant there, the last-named individual is subject to the laws of Wisconsin, and you can not enlarge or restrict the operation of the Wisconsin laws one single bit, no matter how many paragraphs you put into the bill. In my case there was a complete absence of power to override the laws of Wisconsin. Such is the situation as regards the United States. The United States may own the land, but suffers from a complete lack of power to override the laws of Wisconsin.

Again, let me state that the ownership by the United States Government can not and does not create or enlarge the powers that Congress possesses.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that Congress passed, almost by unanimous vote in both Houses, the Hetch Hetchy bill, which provided for the regulation in the greatest detail of matters purely intrastate, power generated in the State, power used in the State, and, further, if it does not make unnecessary the whole argument that whatever Mr. A, the Government, agrees to with Mr. B, the lessee, and incorporates in the contract, that that is a contract between the lessee and the Federal Government?

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman is suggesting what might have been done by the committee. Of course, you can do it by contract, but you can not do it by rules and regulations.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman's question is so completely foreclosed by the fact that all the water power has been developed under regulations that I think no further reply is necessary.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman states a fact which shows that even yet he does not clearly see the awful holes in his bill. Of course, Congress can require that water power on navigable streams can be developed only by complying with certain of its rules. That is regulating commerce and navigation. Indeed, there are some rules Congress could impose upon water-power development on the public domain, but, indeed, not rules or regulations that interfere with or put a burden upon the powers of the State.

So, Mr. Chairman, I might continue, proceeding from paragraph to paragraph, pointing out the futile features of the bill; but why multiply the illustrations? Let me call attention to section 9, and then I am done. This paragraph recognizes the right of a State to control the service, charges for service, and stock and bond issues. It says, in effect, that these are items within the control of the State, but adds that if the State does not exercise its power, then a person is designated by Congress to exercise it. The section recognizes that the control of these features comes within the powers of a State; how, then, can any person be clothed with the power to exercise these functions except at the hands of the State? If the Federal Government has no power to control, and the State has, then the Federal Government can not possibly confer that power upon anyone.

Before provisions such as these can become operative, the Constitution, under which we live, must be materially changed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent also to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has the right to extend his remarks. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago, in the discussion of this conservation measure, a spirit of rancor was shown on the part of the two Republican gentlemen from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY and Mr. JOHNSON, which I do not believe the newer Members of the House understand. Theodore Roosevelt ceased to be President March 4, 1909. For weeks preceding his departure from the White House there was hung up in one of the great committee rooms in this House, in jubilation, a daily bulletin. It first read "Only 30 days more." The next day this was replaced by a bulletin which announced "Only 29 days more." So that bulletin was daily changed until the day Mr. Roosevelt ceased to be President. That was a sincere expression on the part of the men who then controlled the Republican Party in the House. They were glad to chronicle the fact that he was going; glad to know he was gone.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not yield now. One of the reasons that they then opposed Mr. Roosevelt—opposed him in the cloakroom, but not outside upon the floor, because they did not dare—was because of his friendship for Gifford Pinchot and the Pinchot policies. The moment Mr. Roosevelt ceased to be President the atmosphere of this House on the Republican side changed. At once there was open antagonism to Pinchot and his policies and an open indorsement and defense of Ballinger and the Ballinger policies, under which an attempt was made to rob the people of the great natural wealth of Alaska. The rancor and bitterness which has been shown in the scandalous and unjustified attacks here upon Gifford Pinchot to-day are the echo of that day. Let me say to you this conservation measure which you have before you now would not be here for consideration if it had not been for the policies of Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot, and the defeat of the very men who are so free in their criticisms to-day. However, I did not rise for the purpose of defending those who need no defense. I rose for the purpose of reviewing the legislative history of the present Congress as evidencing the attitude of the three political parties here.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to proceed, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman whether he is going to extend his remarks along the line of what he has just been speaking about.

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I am going to speak on the major transactions of the present Congress.

CAMPAIGN PUBLICITY THAT IS NOT PUBLIC.

At the opening of the present Congress I introduced a resolution for the publication of all statements of campaign contributions, including congressional statements and those of national committees then on file with the Clerk of the House, pointing out that under the law, after the lapse of a certain period, these statements would be destroyed, and emphasizing the necessity of publication of the statements if the spirit of the campaign publicity laws were to be carried out. Consideration of my resolution was denied. The statements have never been published.

Both their totals and the list of the contributors contained in the statements were such that neither the Democratic nor Republican leadership here were inclined to enthuse over my proposal, for the Democratic leadership, after years of violent invective and denunciation of the excessive use of money in campaigns, knew that the Democratic national committee had spent more money than any other committee, nearly twice as much as the Progressive national committee, and $200,000 more than the Republican national committee. And the Republican leadership certainly felt that the sum total of its national committee's expenditures, in contrast with the eight electoral votes garnered by Mr. Taft, was a tragical exposition of campaign mismanagement best to be quickly forgotten. Mr. Wilson received 6,293,454 votes, Mr. Roosevelt 4,119,538, and Mr. Taft 3,464,080.

The total contributions and expenditures by the three national committees in 1912 are nevertheless illuminating. They were:

	Contributions.	Expenditures.
Democratic national committee	$1,159,446.33	$1,134,848.00
Republican national committee	904,827.67	900,363.58
Progressive national committee	676,672.73	665,500.00

Eloquent as the total figures are in a day of almost universal revolt against the "barrel" in politics, the detailed items of the statements, showing the sources of contribution, how much was given to the Democratic campaign by certain financial interests in New York, by J. Rupert, of New York, by Roger Sullivan, of Illinois, and others, would undoubtedly be more so had the Democratic leadership provided for their publication.

The refusal to publish them reflects in a way the attitude of the Democratic leadership against real reform, which is more clearly seen in its early, drastic, and persistent use of the secret caucus, its recourse to cloture, and its persistent refusal to change the rules of the House in the interest of popular government.

THE HALT IN REFORM OF THE RULES.

At the beginning of the present Congress the Progressives raised the standard of open committee meetings and the public conference. The Republican leadership, under this challenge and after its initial secret caucus had transacted its most important business, the empowering of its floor leader to select its representatives on committees, a continuation of the Cannon system, declared for open conferences—with a string to the declaration, which makes the pretense absurd—that the open conference can be thrown into a closed caucus by a majority vote. The Democratic leadership held to the closed caucus, with a modification, a provision which is bait to catch gudgeon, the provision that upon demand of one-fifth of those present a roll call shall be taken, which, if demanded, shall be given to the public. Inasmuch as the men in a Democratic caucus are all of one party, and naturally anxious to save one another from common party embarrassment, roll calls have been few and far between. Even when roll calls do take place they do not appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in any publication where they are immediately accessible to the public. That the provision is a pretense is best shown by the fact that at the beginning of this Congress an attempt was made to open up all Democratic caucuses to the public. It was beaten. Under present Democratic leadership, therefore, King Caucus remains. Out of public view, without record of debate and secretly, great measures like the tariff measure and the currency law have been adopted, the representatives of the people bound, often against their better judgment and the interests of their constituents, and public debate and action thereafter in the House itself made pitiably perfunctory. For both the Underwood tariff bill and the Glass currency bill, as they left the House, were virtually word for word the bills passed out to the House by the Democratic caucus.

THE POWER OF THE COMMITTEE PIGEONHOLE.

Not only in its use of the caucus but in the matter of cloture the Democratic leadership, forgetting that one of the great causes for its accession to power was popular revolt against Cannonism, demonstrated how unwilling it is to depart from the old and un-American methods of narrow legislative control. Within the first month of the new Congress a "special rule" saving a great appropriation bill from amendment was adopted. Repeatedly through the life of this Congress the device of "special rules," because of which a nation arose in protest against Republican leadership in the House, has been adopted by the Democratic leadership.

Neither has that leadership suffered in this Congress needed improvement to be made in the general rules of the House. Under the initiative of the insurgents, the Democratic leadership displayed to the country a great anxiety to change the rules so that the House of Representatives should be representative in fact. The powers of the Speaker were diminished by taking away from him the right to name membership on committees. The Unanimous Consent Calendar was created. An improved Calendar Wednesday, which gave ordinary bills on the calendar a chance for consideration against great privileged bills, which were used as buffers and to keep the control of business in a few hands, was established. A right to discharge all committees save one, the Committee on Rules, and thus do away in part with the iniquity of the pigeonhole, was apparently given. To practically all of these changes the Republican leadership then and now is cynically opposed. Calendar Wednesday is in both the old parties here constantly derided as "Holy Wednesday," because it is one day in the week saved to the membership of the House from the dictation of leadership. There were other crying needs for reform in the rules. There ought to be the right for a public roll call in standing committees and in the Committee of the Whole. It is in this committee, in particular, that many important votes take place. There is also a crying necessity for a change in the rules so that Members can discharge committees which have pigeonholed important propositions, for the rule which now provides this is not operative.

The pigeonhole is as potential as it ever was. Moreover, it should be in order for the House to discharge the Committee on Rules. To this great committee go many of the major propositions—propositions for important investigations, requests for consideration of proposed amendments to the Constitution, such as national equal suffrage and prohibition—and there is no way in which the House, under its present rules, can dislodge this Committee on Rules, discharge it from the consideration of a measure and take over the matter itself.

SUPPRESSING THE SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT.

The denial of American womanhood to the right to a part in the conduct of government, one of the Progressive pledges, furnishes a case in point. The record to prevent the advocates of equal suffrage from securing the submission to the people of a suffrage amendment to the Constitution has been one of the most illuminating developments of the whole Congress. For years the advocates of suffrage have sought from the Committee on the Judiciary, in Republican and Democratic Congresses, a favorable report on this amendment. In this Congress they turned for relief to the Committee on Rules, asking the creation of a committee on equal suffrage. The Democratic members of the Committee on Rules defeated the proposition, but thereafter the Judiciary Committee reported out the suffrage amendment, and it was lost in the log jam of the House Calendar. The indefatigable advocates of suffrage thereupon turned to the Committee on Rules again, asking a special rule which would lift the amendment from the calendar and permit the House to consider it. In the meanwhile the Progressive on the committee, Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, had succeeded in putting through that committee a resolution providing that all roll calls in committee on the suffrage amendment should be public, and the country was soon to have the opportunity of witnessing the spectacle of four men keeping the Congress from the consideration of a matter which undoubtedly a majority of the Members were anxious to take up, for when the motion was made to report a rule for the consideration of the amendment the vote stood 4 to 4. Four negative Democratic votes killed the proposition, and there is no power in the House by which the opposition can be overcome. There was thereafter an official adjournment of the Committee on Rules to July 1, 1914, to consider again the resolution for a special rule for the suffrage amendment. When that date arrived no meeting was held. It was postponed until August 1, 1914. No meeting was held August 1, 1914, and the people and Congress and the advocates of suffrage still wait the pleasure of the Democrats on the Committee on Rules, and stand defeated in their proposition to let the people decide whether or not they can change their Constitution.

The Democratic leadership is apparently determined to halt in its reform of the rules at the point it was led by the popular revolt against Cannonism by the insurgents. The Republican leadership is continually sighing for the good old days, never failing to complain of the changes that have been made and manifesting clearly the determination to return to the old order of centralized control, if the House should be given to them by the people again. This attitude among Republican leaders is best evidenced by Senator ELIHU ROOT, of New York, who recently, in an address in the Senate, in referring to the Committee on Rules of the House under Speaker Cannon, which committee then was run by three men, said that it—

> Accomplished the nearest approach to responsible parliamentary government which this country has ever seen.

This, in its essence the basis of all belief in the boss system of government, is still the desire and design of Republican leadership.

THE BIPARTISAN MACHINE AND THE LOBBY INVESTIGATION.

The Progressives at the opening of the Congress proposed changes in the rules that would further improve them, and lift the House nearer and nearer a complete realization of its representative functions—a free House of Representatives, open in all its committees, effective, powerful, and truly representative. Their proposals were rejected, a record vote refused, and the demands they made have since been pigeonholed, although on the opening day the chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. HENRY of Texas, in debate promised that later changes would be granted.

The use of the pigeonhole, then, is as serviceable to the Democratic leadership as it was to the Republican leadership formerly. In this, as in most vital activities, the leaders of both old parties are in desire, purpose, viewpoint, method, and accomplishment identical. And it is because of this identity between the leadership that most of their battles become sham battles, and there has grown up in the House a bipartisan machine, greatly accentuated by the presence of a third and independent party in the House, which bipartisan machine on vital occasions can side-step any issue, and which does.

Review, for instance, the investigation of the lobby. President Wilson, during the consideration of the Underwood tariff bill, complained that that legislation was menaced by an "insidious lobby." Shortly thereafter Col. Mulhall, who formerly as the paid representative of the National Association of Manufacturers had drawn, with other agents of that concern, out of the treasury of that association over $100,000 in his political activities, came out in an article charging a former, and Republican, régime in the House with collusion with the agents of this association in preventing progressive legislation, in dictating the appointment of Members on committees, in blacklisting certain Congressmen.

An investigative committee was selected. A majority of its membership was Democratic. But when the report was made, the Democrats and Republicans on the committee signed the same report. That part of the report made no recommendation. There was ample evidence upon which the Democrats might have held their traditional opponents, the Republicans of the old machine in the House, up to public condemnation. But all signed the report. There was one dissenting voice—that of a Progressive, Mr. MACDONALD, of Michigan. He condemned in unmeasured terms the machinations of the lobby and the machine in the House which had acted with it. In the investigation it also developed that Congressman McDermott, a Democrat, of Chicago, had received certain moneys from the treasury of the federated association of dealers in liquors in the District of Columbia during the pendency of legislation in which they were interested. Mr. MACDONALD, supported by the Progressives, offered in the House, when the report was submitted, resolutions providing that the House forthwith proceed to determine whether it should censure the officers of the National Association of Manufacturers, and proceed also to determine whether it should expel Mr. McDermott. An opposing motion to refer the whole matter to the Judiciary Committee was overwhelmingly carried and the matter permanently sidetracked. The Democrats and Republicans almost unanimously supported the motion to refer. The Progressives, believing that if a record vote could be obtained the result would be different, tried in vain to get such record vote. They were not in sufficient numbers to obtain it. The Judiciary Committee finally reported in favor of the censure of Congressman McDermott. In view of the certainty that, if the motion to censure was considered, a motion would be made to expel him, he resigned. Only a minority reported in favor of the censure of the officers of the National Association of Manufacturers, and nothing further has been done in this feature of the case.

SIDETRACKING THE PRESIDENTIAL-PRIMARY BILL.

On many other occasions the Progressives have asked for record votes on vital matters, notably on their attempt to change the rules and on a tariff-commission plan; and in most of the instances neither the Democrats nor Republicans would assist them in obtaining enough to make up the one-fifth which is necessary to have the roll of Members called.

The pigeonhole as a device for effectual opposition to demanded legislation is never overlooked by the Democratic leadership. In his first regular message to Congress President Wilson, responding to the spirit of the times, urged with the greatest emphasis that Congress pass a presidential primary law. There is great opposition to this proposition on both the Democratic and Republican sides. A Progressive, Mr. HINEBAUGH, of Illinois, had already introduced a bill to inaugurate this system. His bill still sleeps in committee. The exhortation of the Executive, voicing a profound popular desire and demand, has been disregarded. If the Democratic leadership ever does decide to report a measure bearing the name of presidential primary it will be mutilated to meet the objections of those in the House who cling to the oldest forms of the doctrine of State rights and will not be the measure the country is demanding at all.

Nor is the presidential primary the only Progressive demand that is sleeping in committee pigeonholes. The Progressives introduced a bill, through Mr. CHANDLER of New York, for an easier method of changing the Constitution, a most comprehensive measure of vital importance. It is untouched. So is the Progressive bill looking to the inauguration of a practical social insurance, by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. So is the farm-credit measure, by Mr. HULINGS, of Pennsylvania. So is the Progressive measure for the creation of a national bureau of employment, the Progressive child-labor bill, the Nolan bill prohibiting the shipment of convict-made goods in interstate traffic, the equal-suffrage amendment, the bill creating a commission to adjust naturalization inequalities, the tariff-commission bill, the Progressive workmen's compensation bill, and others.

PROGRESSIVES FOR EFFECTIVE MEASURES, REGARDLESS OF ORIGIN.

While the majority party has not reported out these Progressive measures for the betterment of social and industrial conditions, the Progressives in Congress have not hesitated to give their hearty support to all meritorious measures whatever their origin, as in the instance of the bill for the Government construction of a railroad in Alaska. They would battle with equal willingness if they had the opportunity for an efficient farm-credit bill, as they battled to make more effective a campaign publicity measure, and as they strove without success to take the entire Postal Service, postmasters included, out of the spoils system, as proposed in an amendment offered by me on August 1 last and overwhelmingly voted down, while at the same time the Democratic leadership was busy taking the assistant postmasters out of civil service, as they had previously kept income-tax collectors, deputy marshals, and deputy revenue collectors out of the merit system. They would battle for an effective bill prohibiting gambling in cotton futures, as they have fought against the proposition of putting off on the cotton growers of the South, under the pretense of prohibiting gambling in cotton futures, a bill which, in fact, legalizes it.

The history of the cotton futures bill in this Congress is typical of the attitude of the two old parties in meeting the demands of the people. When the Underwood tariff bill was in the Senate there was added to it by Senator CLARKE of Arkansas a radical amendment against gambling in cotton futures. When the bill, after conference, reached the House that body receded from the disagreement with the Senate on this Clarke amendment and concurred with an amendment—offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD—which, as was pointed out in debate at the time, would not prohibit gambling in cotton futures, but which would legalize it. The motion in the House to concur with the Senate's proposition with this amendment was adopted by a narrow margin. The next day, as was to be expected, the Senate disagreed to the Underwood amendment, and, without waiting for action on the part of the House, destroyed the Clarke amendment by receding from it. The following day, against protest, the House receded from its own substitute. During these discussions assurance had been given that later in the Congress a separate measure dealing with this evil would be considered. Later a bill, introduced in the Senate and amended in the House, was passed. The bill passed will not suppress gambling. It will legalize it. The Progressives in Congress made every effort in their power to have this legislation effective, not sham. The best-known method of suppressing gambling in cotton is to prohibit the use of the mails in gambling transactions. This method is efficacious; and it was this method the Democratic leadership would not employ.

A CHANCE TO SUPPRESS COTTON GAMBLING AND FAILURE.

Here we have an illuminating set of circumstances typical of the methods of the leadership of the two old political parties. Under the scourge of an acknowledged evil, hurtful morally and injurious economically, the South had cried out for a quarter of a century against the gamblers on the cotton exchanges. The protest was given hope in this plank in the last Democratic platform:

> We believe in encouraging the development of a modern system of agriculture and a systematic effort to improve the conditions of trade in farm products so as to benefit both the consumers and producers. And as an efficient means to this end, we favor the enactment by Congress of legislation that will suppress the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges or others.

Now, the Democratic leadership which had made this pledge to suppress was at last in power. It had the Senate and the House and the Executive. Virtually all the chairmanships of the great committees are held by southern Democrats. There could be no question about control. Palpably something must be done in redemption of that pledge to the cotton growers. But the proposition at once appealed to the Democratic leadership in a new light. This had been an infamous thing before they were in power. But now that they were in power, that they could afford relief, the question was not, How much relief can we bring by stopping this evil? but the question was, How much can we appear to be carrying out the pledges of the platform without stopping the evil? Their motto as public servitors is not "How much?" but "How little?" The pledge was to suppress gambling in cotton futures. The bill passed proposes ostensibly to correct the evil. Admittedly it will do no such thing. And a year hence gambling will be flourishing as before, the cotton growers will be victimized as usual, the Democratic plank will stand unredeemed, and the Democratic leadership will be talking solemnly of the need of amendments.

What is true of their attitude on the evil of cotton gambling is true on other major legislation, notably the currency legislation, a subject I will elaborate upon a little later in my remarks.

THE TARIFF—PROGRESSIVE, DEMOCRATIC, AND REPUBLICAN RECORD.

The first effort of the Democratic leadership after their accession to power was the tariff. The demand for a revision of the Dingley tariff law arose in 1904–5, and in 1908 the Republicans pledged in their national platform a revision. In 1909 the Republican leaders revised the law upward, not downward. A wave of great popular indignation swept the country. The Democrats carried the House of Representatives and at once began a revision of the tariff, one schedule at a time. These bills went to a Republican Senate, were considered there, and were passed on to President Taft, who vetoed them. In 1913 the Democratic leadership, having gained the Senate and the White House, took up as their first performance a revision of the tariff, and, unmindful of the fate of the high-handed Republican leaders who had preceded them, they resorted at once to those methods which were under universal condemnation—secret consideration in committee, caucus cloture, and random, haphazard, guesswork revision in an omnibus bill.

For the Progressives I offered at the first meeting of the Ways and Means Committee a motion that all meetings of that committee should be open. This motion was voted down. The tariff bill was framed by the Democratic members of the committee. It was then taken before the secret Democratic caucus and approved. And as it was approved by the caucus, so it went through the House, virtually without change. No matter how meritorious an amendment was, if the caucus had not indorsed it it was anathema. Let me illustrate: When the income-tax features of the bill were reached the larger incomes were not taxed in just proportion. To effect this I offered the following amendment, which was supported by the Progressives but overwhelmingly defeated by the Democrats and Republicans:

Amend, page 134, line 1, after the figures "$100,000," by striking out the numeral "3" and inserting in lieu thereof the numeral "6."

The purpose was to increase the tax on incomes in excess of $100,000 from 3 per cent to 6 per cent. Undoubtedly a great number of Democrats were for this proposition, for when an amendment levying a tax of 6 per cent on incomes above $500,000 was added in the Senate and came back to the House the Democrats supported it.

THE PROGRESSIVE TEST ON A TARIFF COMMISSION.

The attitude of the Republican leadership during the consideration of the Underwood tariff bill was shown in the perfunctory offer of amendments, many of them carrying the old duties of the Payne law. Coupled with this activity was a criticism by the Republicans of the method by which the Democrats were considering the bill. They had for the moment forgotten that when the Payne bill with its 4,000 items was considered in the House only five amendments were permitted to be offered—on hides, lumber, barley, barley malt, and oil.

When the Underwood tariff bill reached its final stages in the House, after its third reading and before its final passage, the Republican leaders offered a motion to recommit the bill with instructions, the chief feature of which was the creation of a makeshift tariff commission. This had been offered in the Committee of the Whole as an amendment and was held to be out of order. It was certain to be held out of order in the House. The point of order was made in the House against it, it was held out of order, and no record vote was had upon it. I offered immediately to that part of the Republican instructions remaining a substitute, the chief feature of which was the provision for a revision of the tariff on facts adduced by a nonpartisan, scientific tariff commission, one schedule at a time, with a record vote on each schedule. No point of order was made against this Progressive substitute. A standing vote was taken. Speaker CLARK announced that 17 had voted for it. I protested, inasmuch as there were 19 Progressives then in the House. These Progressives were Representatives NOLAN, BELL, and STEPHENS, of California; BRYAN and FALCONER, of Washington; LAFFERTY, of Oregon; LINDBERGH, of Minnesota; WOODRUFF, of Michigan; COPLEY, HINEBAUGH, and THOMSON, of Illinois; KELLY, HULINGS, LEWIS, RUPLEY, TEMPLE, and WALTERS, of Pennsylvania; CHANDLER of New York; and myself. Mr. MACDONALD, of Michigan, had not been seated at that time. The 19 Progressives signed a paper addressed to the Speaker declaring they had voted for the Progressive substitute. Speaker CLARK announced that he had received the paper, explained the difficulty of counting standing votes, and asked unanimous consent to change the 17 to 19. This was accorded. During the contest I attempted to obtain a record vote upon my substitute. A demand of one-fifth of those present is required to obtain a record vote. We were not strong enough numerically to obtain the one-fifth. We could have secured it had we enjoyed the help of the Republican leadership. It was not given. No record vote was secured. That is, the Republican leadership, which has been loud in its protestations of advocacy of a tariff commission, when given the opportunity to vote on the commission proposition did not avail themselves of it. The omnibus Underwood tariff bill was amended 676 times in the Senate. These amendments were, of course, vital. Again, in secret, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee in the House and the Democratic members of the Finance Committee in the Senate met and agreed upon the items in dispute. Then all members of the conference—the Republicans and myself, as a Progressive—were invited in, and in a perfectly perfunctory manner the 676 items in dispute were adjusted in exactly seven minutes. I was a member of the conference and made note of the time.

MAKING A RANDOM TARIFF IN SECRET.

This is the history of the Underwood tariff bill. It began in secret and ended in secret. The bill which was reported out of the Democratic portion of the Ways and Means Committee was the same bill reported out of committee, then out of caucus, and finally passed through the House. It was an omnibus bill. It could not be comprehended by the membership of the House. No single mind in the course of desultory and perfunctory debate can grasp the thousands of items which make up a tariff bill and which affect vitally every line of business in the United States.

The bill developed, however, the attitude of the three parties as to general tariff policies. The Democrats developed an anomalous attitude, based partly on a traditional belief in free trade, in this instance applied ruthlessly to the cereal farmers, a doubting desire for revenue duties, and a more or less anxious concern for protective duties where Democratic sentiment demanded them. The Republicans stood, as before, for a prohibitive protective tariff, defending the high duties of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and giving every evidence that, if restored to power, they would reenact that measure so completely repudiated by the people. The Progressives stood for a revision of the tariff, one schedule at a time, on facts adduced by a nonpartisan scientific tariff commission, with the rates of duty based, not on the prohibitive principle, but on the protective principle, under which conditions of competition between the United States and foreign countries should be equalized, both for the manufacturer and the farmer, with the maintenance of an adequate standard of living for the men and women in the industries affected by these schedules, to the end that the home market might not only be protected, but that industry might be strengthened for its conquest of foreign markets.

The Democratic tariff has done none of the things which it was claimed it would do. The Democratic leadership had claimed for years that the prevailing tariff had nurtured and maintained the great combinations which under a grant of special privilege dominated the business of the Nation and preyed upon the people. The contention was made by that leadership, over a long period of time, in campaign and out of campaign, that if the Democratic leadership were given a chance to revise the tariff, "the mother of trusts," the strangle hold of the great combinations could be broken. The Underwood tariff has been the law of the land for over a year. It has nowhere broken the power of the trusts or disturbed them. It has, on the contrary, by its disturbance of general conditions, inevitable in a random, guesswork revision, menaced the smaller and independent factors in trade to the advantage of the great and predatory combinations.

Similarly the increasing cost of living in America had long been ascribed by the Democrats to their absence from power and their inability to revise the tariff. Given that power, and the tariff revised by the Democratic leadership, and the cost of living was not reduced. It has increased.

And while neither disturbance to the great combinations nor a reduction of the cost of living followed the passage of an omnibus tariff bill, the desirable independent factors in manufacture were hurt, the farmer was injured, and the burden upon the back of labor was heaped higher.

Here then was an achievement which resulted in no good and infinite harm.

OSTENSIBLE ACCOMPLISHMENT VERSUS ACTUAL RESULTS.

But for the moment the Democratic leadership, after the enactment of the Underwood bill, evidenced much and smug satisfaction. It had revised the tariff. This attitude is an indispensable key to a correct understanding of the economic history of the United States in the last 18 months. There was a popular demand for a revision of the tariff downward. The Republican leadership denied that demand. The Democratic leadership responded to it. And both miserably failed in results, and the Nation is interested alone in results. Under prevailing methods any political party will fail to get satisfactory results. There is only one way to revise the tariff with satisfactory results and with safety and justice to all—that is the Progressive way—the revision of the tariff one schedule at a time upon data adduced by a nonpartisan scientific tariff commission, with the rates based on the protective principle enunciated in the Progressive national platform, which I have previously set forth. The Progressives were after results, beneficial results, to all the people. The Republican leadership, true enough, wanted results—the results of a prohibitive protective tariff to the favored few. The Democratic leadership was not after results—it was set on putting through a program regardless of results. The tariff was to be revised. The Democratic platform had promised it. They revised it. This anxiety to put through a program, regardless of the effects of legislation, has characterized most of their activities on major matters in this Congress. They have been bent on keeping the word of promise to the ear, with no concern whether they broke it to the hope. They are paying the penalty to-day, for their random tariff has not fulfilled the pledge either in curbing the trusts or reducing the cost of living.

THE RETREAT FROM REAL CURRENCY REFORM.

The same impeachment lies against the Democratic leadership in the matter of currency legislation. Before the Republicans went out of power, and after the Democrats had secured the House of Representatives, a commission was appointed to investigate the Money Trust. A majority of this commission were Democrats. After full and complete investigation these Democrats found that a Money Trust existed; that it held its tremendous power over credit in the United States by certain well-defined, pernicious practices in Wall Street. These Democrats made an exhaustive report to Congress and they embodied in their report, specifically and in terms, amendments to the laws designed to break up the Money Trust. But when the new currency bill was in preparation these recommendations were shoved aside. As a framework to the new currency measure, the plan, known as the Aldrich plan, which with its 50-year franchise to a central bank had been generally condemned, was liberally drawn upon.

The bill as reported out of the committee was considered in secret Democratic caucus. It is reported that an effort was made in the caucus to incorporate in the new measure some of the recommendations of the Money Trust commission, including the prohibition of interlocking directorates. These were voted down. When the bill reached the House it was given the same perfunctory consideration which had characterized the tariff bill. For the Progressives I offered the amendments which the Democratic Money Trust commission had recommended. These amendments were voted down by Democrats and Republicans. The Democratic leadership, so far as currency legislation was concerned, was taking a mincing, timid half step when in power, where a year before, out of power, it had pointed the way to complete remedy and had criticized its opponents for not taking the full step. Legislation for farm loans, properly a part of this legislation and urgently demanded everywhere, was barred out. The currency bill, a bank bill which provides for the creation of Government money, redeemable by the Government, issued to the banker at a low per cent, money based on his assets, money to be loaned by him to his customers at any per cent he desires, was passed. Although there was much long and eloquent speech making that one of the purposes of the bill was to reduce the power of New York City over credits, among the men selected as a member of the controlling Reserve Board was a Wall Street banker, Mr. Warburg, popularly reputed to be the author of the old Aldrich plan. As part of the new currency law the old Republican Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency measure was included. This provided for an emergency currency to an amount not exceeding $500,000,000. This law was bitterly condemned by the Democratic leadership at the time of its passage. Now, it was taken over and the rate of interest to be charged the banker for its use reduced. Recently this part of the new currency law was amended in the House over my protest by removing the limit of $500,000,000 and making the amount that may be issued unlimited. And in one week recently the bankers took out $165,000,000 of this emergency currency, at a cost of 3 per cent to them, when call money in New York was 8 per cent and clearing-house certificates 6 per cent.

The farm credit currency measure still sleeps in committee. The provision in the currency bill that passed which provided for loans by banks on farm lands is a pretense. It does not operate. It will not. The bankers know this. The farmers are discovering it.

When the currency bill was before the House for final passage, Mr. WALTERS, of Pennsylvania, offered for the Progressives an amendment prohibiting interlocking directorates. A record vote was obtained. The proposition received only 101 votes and was lost.

THE FEEBLE DEMOCRATIC ATTEMPT AT ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

When the trust proposition was brought before the Congress for consideration the Democratic leadership in the House presented three propositions: (1) The creation of a trade commission, (2) regulation of the issue of stocks and bonds of interstate carriers, and (3) amendments to the Sherman antitrust law, seeking to give further definitions to the courts under that act. The trade commission proposed by the Democrats in the House was a purely investigative commission without adequate power. The amendments to the Sherman antitrust law were mostly random, groping provisions which, if they became law, would further confuse and muddle the whole question. It was plain that if the question was to be handled effectively at all, and the country saved from further depredations by the great monopolies, it was necessary that the whole subject be approached with a determination to avoid damaging delay in the courts, and to bring to bear upon the whole question sanely constructive solutions of the problem. The dissolution of the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust, which resulted, not in dissolution, but in advantage to those in control of these commercial monsters, challenged every publicist. Plainly, to follow in the direction in which the Democratic leadership led was to travel the old useless circle from the doubting Congress to the hesitant Attorney General, to the delaying courts, and back to Congress again. So I offered for the Progressives a concrete, comprehensive, and constructive plan for the solution of the problem. The plan was embodied in three bills.

These three bills do not confound big business and monopoly. They do not attack the form of monopoly, but they do attack its substance. They recognize that there are monopolies which have grown from natural causes and monopolies that have grown from unnatural and illegal practices. They eliminate both kinds of monopolies. They recognize the beneficence of cooperation, but they differentiate between beneficent cooperation and the deadly forces of monopolistic combination; and they would give honest business full information as to just what it can and what it can not legally and properly do.

The Progressive bills, in a word, provided for a strong administrative trade commission with power to find the facts and to act upon them; with the business of directly determining the existence of monopoly, the basis of that monopoly, and the manner of suppressing that monopoly. The first Progressive antitrust measure created a strong trade commission. The proposed Democratic trade commission was a feeble board with nothing more than investigative powers and dependent upon the virtues of an optional publicity which an existing Bureau of Corporations has invoked for years in vain. The second Progressive bill gives the trade commission power to order an offending corporation to desist from unfair trade practices, which are defined, and, upon the corporation's refusal to do so, provides that the commission may apply to the courts for the enforcement of its orders. The third Progressive antitrust measure provides that whenever a corporation exercises control over a sufficient portion of a given industry or over sufficient factors therein to determine the price policy in that industry the commission may determine that such concern exercises substantially monopolistic power, which power is declared to be contrary to public policy. Having so determined, the commission is then empowered to determine upon what basis this monopolistic power rests—artificial bases or natural bases. Artificial bases are acts of unfair competition, which are defined; natural bases are the control of natural resources, of transportation facilities, of financial resources, of any economic condition inherent in the character of the industry, including patent rights. If the monopoly should rest on artificial bases, the commission is empowered to order the concern to desist from its acts of unfair competition and to call upon the courts to enforce its orders. If the monopoly should rest on natural bases, it is made the duty of the commission to issue an order specifying such changes in the organization, conduct, or management of the monopoly as will promptly terminate the monopoly. If the monopoly resists the order of the commission, then the commission may apply to the courts for the appointment of a supervisor for such concern, with power to carry into effect the commission's orders.

This is, in brief, the Progressive plan. It was simple, direct, and constructive.

THE PROGRESSIVES, THE DEMOCRATS, THE REPUBLICANS, AND THE TRUSTS.

The Democratic proposal, a feeble commission and added definitions to the Sherman antitrust law, left the whole problem to the courts. The proposal was blind, timid, hesitant, halfway.

The Republican leadership offered nothing. It apparently favored further exposition by the courts of the Sherman antitrust law as it stands.

The attitude of the Democratic leadership has been that of the blind leading the blind. The attitude of Republican leadership that of those who had determined to stand pat and stand still. The Progressives pointed a new, straight, direct way to an adequate solution of the problem. When the Democratic proposals were under consideration I offered the Progressive propositions. They were voted down. On the passage of the Democratic trade commission measure I offered the strong Progressive trade commission proposal. It was rejected.

THE TARIFF, THE CURRENCY, AND THE ANTITRUST RECORD.

I have given the legislative history of three major measures in the House.

In the case of the tariff bill the Progressive tariff commission plan offered to the House was not supported by the Republican leadership, which is loud in its advocacy of such a commission.

In the case of the currency bill the strong amendments prepared by the Democrats of the Money Trust Commission were offered in the House by the Progressives and the Democratic leadership rejected them.

In the case of the antitrust bills the strong, clear, comprehensive, constructive measures offered by the Progressives were opposed by the Democratic leadership, which was groping, and the Republican leadership, which was stationary.

THE MISSION OF THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY.

Through all these issues and the contests which have grown out of them the Democratic leadership has been constructive only in so far as it was necessary to consummate a program, to do something and to declare it done. The Republican leadership has carried its party into a negative position, where its chief activity has been largely a lively hope of future party prosperity through the mistakes of the Democratic majority.

The one party has played to retain its party power. The other has played to regain its party power. The Progressives have sought to serve all the people, regardless of party or party power.

Far from exercising mere partisan opposition, the Members of the Progressive Party have introduced in the House the practice of giving whole-hearted support to desirable legislation, no matter what its origin. They supported the Cullop amendment, providing that the President make public all indorsements of applicants for judicial place, a Democratic pledge which Democratic leadership has repudiated. They supported the Alaskan railroad bill. They have fought to make all conservation measures more effective. They have advocated adequate appropriations for the new Children's Bureau, which were being withheld. They opposed with virtually a united front the proposition to surrender to Great Britain our sovereign rights in the Panama Canal. They have at all times exercised the right to vote as they believed they should vote, without trammel of party caucus, without let or hindrance of party prejudice. And they have been first in the initiation of constructive legislation for the advancement of the democracy.

For the Progressive Party has endeavored to have Congress write into concrete terms of law exact justice; to establish direct popular government, so that the people, and the people alone, shall rule; to frame in the open, sanely, understandingly, a tariff which would not only maintain prosperity but pass prosperity around; to institute currency reforms which would destroy the tyranny of the credit monopoly and grant special privilege in money issues to none; to enact antitrust laws that would be at once destructive to dishonest business and a guide and protection to honest industry and commerce. The Progressive Party has offered in fulfillment of its covenant with the people, made in its national platform of 1912, measures for the betterment of industrial and economic conditions, measures to establish social and industrial justice, measures to make representative government more effective and more responsible. It has placed right above wrong, justice above injustice, national need above sectional advantage, the public weal above private profit, and man above mammon. It deserves no less credit because its proposals have been rejected, for, moved by the high ideals and the aspirations which gave it birth, it is marching on, confident that service will triumph over sham, light over darkness, that truth will prevail against technicality, that patriotism will eventually overslaugh partisanship, confident that the people, through a new party, willing to serve and to give to the Government in full measure the devotion which will bring to all men and women complete representation and a square deal, will come at last into their own.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming there is practically one important matter that is involved after the general understanding of what can be done is agreed upon. The gentleman from Wyoming, and, in fact, all so far, concede that the Government can sell or lease its public domain upon conditions the same as a private individual may lease or sell his holdings, under conditions. That being agreed upon—and I understand the gentleman from Wyoming concurs in it—the question then comes whether or not the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming is wise in a State where the entire plant is located and where the entire output is to be sold.

This bill provides, in section 9, that if there is a public-service commission in that State it fixes the price that the consumer is to pay. It fixes the question of the relation of the issues of bonds and stock; in other words, regulates it as a public utility for the interest of the consumers.

Now, having come to the conclusion or determination that the Government may lease its land to be used in developing a power plant, which plant, perchance, is located in the corner of some one State, it is of necessity, without any extension—or in its ordinary force would be—in two or three or four States. There are many cities located on the border, part of the city in one State and part in another, and some in three States, and others that are very close to the border. The purpose of the bill as reported by the committee is that the Government, having the ownership of the land, and the line going into several States, may regulate the question of the price to the consumers, so that all under that system would be treated alike, notwithstanding they may be but a few miles apart, one in one State and one in another, and that the question of the issuance of the bonds and stock would all be under the control of the one power. Without any national law, the committee believed that the Secretary of the Interior, representing the Government, should stipulate that when you accept this lease you must comply with a condition fixed therein as to supplying power to your consumers in two States if it goes into two States, as well as to the issuance of bonds and stocks, so that, as stated, all would be under that one service, although they may run in two States, and the consumers would be treated alike and receive power at the same price.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman contend that a private individual leasing land for power purposes could legally make it a condition of the lease that if the power was delivered in more than one State the public-service commission of the State could not have any control over the enterprise?

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not make any such contention as that.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what the bill does.

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not think so.

Mr. MONDELL. It says the Secretary of the Interior shall control.

Mr. RAKER. I believe, notwithstanding our attempt to legislate here upon a condition fixed in the lease, because of the fact that the Government owns the land, if a man installs a complete plant to furnish electric energy to a city or community, he then comes under the law of the State, if there is one in that State, as to furnishing electric energy for those who receive it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment to the first part of section 3, which takes away from the Federal Government all of the right it has to control the water powers generated on its own lands. I have carefully copied and read the amendment of the gentleman, and it is carefully worded, being clipped from some other bill he introduced, and surely the House does not want to adopt it or any other amendment like it. I call attention to the fact that five or six of the Western States have no public utility commissions at all. I want to know who in fact would regulate the charges for water powers in those States. There can be but one answer to that, and that is they would escape any regulation at all. Again, it is a matter of the gravest sort—and I do not think any considerable portion of the House would think of doing it—to absolutely cut off all of the right of the Federal Government to control what goes on on its own property.

Listen to what the gentleman's amendment provides:

That all leases shall be granted upon the condition and subject to the reservation that at all times during the use and enjoyment thereof, and of the water appropriated and used in connection therewith, the service and charges therefor, including all electric power generated or used in connection therewith, shall be subject to the regulation and control of the State within which the same is used and subject to the fixing of the rates and charges for the use thereof and the issue of securities by such State or under its authority.

The moment the transmission line carrying electricity crosses the State line, then if they had a public utility commission the State would lose control; but in those States where they have no public utility commissions, and there are four or five or six of them, I want to know who would control the water-power companies?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman understands that under my amendment the State in which the power was used would have complete control.

Mr. FERRIS. In the bill a later section provides that where the power is generated in a State and used in a State, and the State had a public utility commission, the public utility commission governs; but in a State where there is no public utility commission, and doing interstate business, I ask, under the gentleman's amendment, where we would have any regulation at all. There are some people who will even object to allowing the State public utility commission to control, even on strictly intra business, but surely everyone who is friendly to legislation of this sort and who is at all favorable to Federal control of water power would be opposed to the gentleman's amendment.

I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 1, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do it especially to inquire as to the reason that prompted the committee in permitting the authorization of combination of plants and of these various distributing lines.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, that amendment on its face would to one who had not given it consideration seem subject to criticism; but I can do no better than call the gentleman's attention to the proposition where two or three little power companies with small dam sites are required to make up a complete system of electric lighting in a city. It would certainly be folly and duplication of work and expense, as was shown by the best authorities that appeared before us, including ex-Secretary Fisher and others, to have two or three companies dabbling away at it, just like a duplicate telephone system in a town. The gentleman no doubt has towns in his district where two companies are dabbling at the telephone business, neither of which can give good service, but both of which are trying to give duplicate service. If you go to a telephone and call up somebody, they tell you that it is on the other line. Therefore every business man in the town puts in telephones of the two telephone companies for certain service. So it is necessary in the interest of good administration, as urged by all the authorities who appeared before us, engineers, and so forth, to say that in one case it is necessary, while in the other case it is vicious to have such a combination.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can understand, so far as the illustration in reference to the telephone companies is concerned, as to the need of having but one telephone system in a municipality in reference to a service which they both serve, but under the authorization as here given I can conceive that it might be gravely abused, for here is authorization for a combination, as you may say, or for one gigantic trust to generate electric power. The very purpose we are seeking after is to establish competing generating plants, where there is a public demand, under public supervision and control; and yet here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under this authority you are giving the Secretary the power of allowing all these plants to be combined into one gigantic water-power trust.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. While that is hard to conceive, yet I can realize how it may be abused by some Secretary, or through influence and connivance with subordinate officials in control. I yield to the gentleman, but I desire to ask him another question.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to call attention to the last part of the paragraph, which expressly prevents and prohibits combinations when there is anything tending to monopoly or agreement to raise prices and other various things mentioned; in other words, to increase the prices of electric energy.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman knows that all of these combinations claim that they are not for the purpose of raising prices, and yet we know that the monopoly is for the purpose of getting a large profit and ultimately raising prices. They are claiming, of course, that it does not raise prices. The gentleman anticipated me, because I want to ask him why should we in this bill try to supplement the Sherman antitrust law in the provision which was referred to by the gentleman? What is the need of that qualification? It says that combinations, agreements, arrangements, or understandings, expressed or implied, to limit the output of electrical energy are hereby forbidden. In fact, such practices are forbidden under the Sherman antitrust law. The Supreme Court has construed that law. It is a matter of serious concern whether we should add to or supplement the Sherman antitrust law when there is nothing gained and much confusion may result by inserting it. Does not the gentleman believe that the Sherman antitrust law would apply without that qualifying language?

Mr. FERRIS. Probably, yes; if the gentleman will pardon me, but water power is in its infancy. Twenty-four years ago there was no such thing as water power generating electricity. The first plant was stationed in Colorado in 1890, 24 years ago. I think the gentleman, good lawyer that he is, will always recognize the fact it is better to have the laws all incorporated together, all reading together, and all construed together and standing as a legal entity.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will realize that the Sherman antitrust law has a well-defined application and a well-defined construction, and though not intended originally to apply to water powers, because not then in existence, they are included in its application and extent. I question very seriously whether we should attempt by special legislation to supersede or supplement the Sherman antitrust law when it is understood that that law fully applies to such a combination.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman believe that if this added clause which he complains about is not included in the proviso the first part of the proviso will probably have the effect of repealing the Sherman antitrust law in so far as water power is concerned?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at all. The first part of the proviso only applies to the physical combination of plants and of lines; nothing more; and it is in that part of the proviso which forbids combination, monopolies, and unlawful agreements and discrimination that you are applying language that has not been construed by the Supreme Court; you are placing in here a provision that has never been interpreted by the court.

Mr. BRYAN. It seems to me the clause beginning with the word "but" there shuts out what would be an attempt on the part of water-power users to say this act repeals the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recognizes the court would construe this as supplementing and virtually superseding the Sherman antitrust law, and that there will be another suspense as to the interpretation to be given to this provision by the courts, and it might be held that the Sherman law had been superseded and not considered as applicable.

Mr. BRYAN. That will not hurt anybody who believes in the enforcement of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CLINE. I want to ask for a little information, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I speak in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Under this provision that prohibits combinations, does this bill, or this particular section of the bill, meet, for instance, this situation: I have in mind a company that generates electricity. That company sells the electricity and has nothing to do with the transmission of it. It sells it to a transmitting company. The transmitting company has nothing whatever to do with the generation of the electricity and nothing to do with the distributing of it, but that company sells to a third company, which is a distributing company. Of course, it is evident, especially where the majority of the directors belong to each individual company, and yet each company is organized under the State in which it exists as a separate and distinct corporation, that that must tend to increase the charge which the consumer must pay. Does this particular section meet that condition?

Mr. FERRIS. They can not sell more than 50 per cent of the power to anyone, and there is a section later on that prevents them from selling to anyone else except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLINE. It can not sell to a holding company?

Mr. FERRIS. Not without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLINE. I am referring to the section now under consideration. These companies are absolutely distinct organizations, organized in the State in which they are operated, and have no relation whatever to each other in the generation, transmission, or distribution of electricity. My inquiry is whether this section will meet that condition? Neither one of the companies is a holding company for the other two.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me call the attention to section 4, where it says:

That except upon the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior no sale or delivery of power shall be made to a distributing company, except in case of an emergency, and then only for a period not exceeding 30 days, nor shall any lease issued under this act be assignable or transferable without such written consent.

The thought we had in mind was exactly what the gentleman thinks—that they might peddle it around to a distributing company and on to another distributing company, until it would be hard to fix the responsibility and rate of charges. Our thought was that each time when they sought to do it, if they had to come in and get authority, the Secretary could guard the conditions under which the transfer was made and could control the service and rates, and still keep the power well guarded in the interests of the public.

Mr. CLINE. It is not practicable for a generating company to transmit and distribute the electricity.

Mr. FERRIS. I take it the gentleman does not make that as a uniform condition, but in many cases it is true.

Mr. CLINE. If that be true—of course, it is the information of the chairman—I understand that a company generating hydroelectricity could generate it, transmit it, and sell it to the consumer?

Mr. FERRIS. Not necessarily that. We do think it necessary for them to get permission so to do before it is done, so that the Secretary who grants that authority can see to it that all of the interests are guarded.

Mr. CLINE. And if they get that permission, the Secretary of the Interior would sufficiently scrutinize the application so as to prohibit any increase of prices unduly to the consumer?

Mr. FERRIS. The thought of the committee was that he specially should have that responsibility, it being necessary for him to pass upon the advisability of the sale and insert and incorporate in the assignment such conditions and regulations and constraints as would protect the consumers and the public.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I observe that section 3 confers upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to regulate and control the service, charge for service, and issue of stocks and bonds. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is his understanding that the language as to regulation and control involves the power to initiate and fix the rates charged consumers?

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman desire an answer at this point?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Our thought was very clear that the Secretary had the right to fix the rate and would fix the rate at the inception of the contract, which would be incorporated in the lease, and which would enable him to regulate it from time to time as the facts might warrant.

Mr. SCOTT And under this law the lessee would have no power to originate and fix a rate?

Mr. FERRIS. That is very true; and it being a public utility—and I think that theory is pretty generally accepted now—they would be subject to regulation from the start, and at the finish, and at all intervening points.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not speaking of the regulation. I am speaking of the power to fix the rate being vested in the Secretary and being withheld from the lessee.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think the power to regulate involves the question of fixing the rate?

Mr. SCOTT. Possibly the right to control might involve the right to fix. Assuming that this law does vest in the Secretary of the Interior the right to initiate and fix the original rate, will the chairman tell me what is meant by this latter clause in the section which prohibits the joint lessees from entering into agreements to fix or to maintain or to raise rates? If they have no power whatever to originate or initiate a rate, what office does this prohibition against this fixing the rate in the latter part of the section serve?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is fully aware that all public utilities, railroads, telephones, and all carriers, have no right to fix rates in toto, but they are all subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. While the Sherman antitrust law and the various amendments that have been added to it were all for the express purpose of keeping down trade agreements that oppress the public.

Mr. SCOTT. I am aware of the contrary proposition that a railroad has the power to fix a rate, the power in the Interstate Commerce Commission being only to regulate the rate so fixed.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, well, that amounts to the same thing.

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. If the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to sweep away at any moment the rate charged, to raise it or lower it or remove it, what difference does it make who puts in the original rate or schedule of the original contract, or what difference is it who says what shall be charged on the first day it starts up? The test is who really has power to regulate it, fix it, and so forth.

Mr. SCOTT. The Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of railroads has no such power as the gentleman suggests. What I am at a loss to know is, Where is the power vested to fix the original rate? Is it in the lessee or in the Secretary?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly it is not in the lessee, and nobody would want it to be in the lessee. To do that would be to be without regulation at all.

Mr. SCOTT. What possible influence can this latter provision have which prohibits the raising or the fixing or the combining to maintain? Is not that wholly superfluous? When could it be invoked?

Mr. FERRIS. I think not at all.

Mr. SCOTT. When could it be invoked, and under what circumstances?

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman want to place his sanction upon two power companies getting together to restrain trade, or to limit the amount of electrical power generated, or to enter into a gentleman's agreement to oppress the public and raise the price to an unconscionable degree?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. And the gentleman would not place a ban upon the proposition to break down such a practice?

Mr. SCOTT. That could not arise unless the power were vested in the lessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Under the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa there would be unquestionably no necessity for the latter provision, because both corporations would be regulated as to the price they would charge to the consumer. But here is only one corporation, or one individual, obtaining this right from the Government. It is true there may be another on the other side that desires to connect, that did not obtain its rights or any part of them from the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. Then it would not fall within this section. This section provides for two companies that receive their leases by reason of the provisions of this law.

Mr. RAKER. It does not mean that.

Mr. SCOTT. It plainly says so. It says, "The physical combination of plants or lines for the generation," and so forth, "under this act." If anyone can tell me or can conceive of a case that could possibly arise that would meet that provision, unless the lessee has the right to fix the rate at some time, I would like him to do it.

Mr. RAKER. Can not the gentleman conceive of a plant that does not obtain its right under the Government? One other plant might obtain its rights from the Government, and the two might combine.

Mr. SCOTT. Not under this section. This section permits the combination of the physical plants which have been constructed under this law, and those only, and therefore it can only apply to those plants.

Mr. RAKER. What is the gentleman's contention?

Mr. SCOTT. My contention is that either one of two propositions is true: Either the power to initiate the rate rests with the lessee or the latter proviso is meaningless.

Mr. RAKER. This refers to only the physical combination.

Mr. SCOTT. No; it refers to the combination to raise and fix rates.

Mr. RAKER. You are speaking of the proviso, the first part?

Mr. SCOTT. And therefore the courts will not adopt an interpretation of the law which renders half of the provisions of the law meaningless unless forced to do so. Therefore it seems to me the courts would interpret "regulation and control" in the same way that they interpret it in the interstate-commerce law, and not so as to give the power to initiate the rate. It is simply a question as to whether this law would confer a greater power in the Government of fixing rates here than the present Interstate Commerce Commission act does upon the commission. Our commission, you know, can not initiate the rate.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me interrupt the gentleman. The gentleman is troubled about the proposition. The gentleman knows that in a railroad proposition they fix up the schedule of rates and submit it, and the Interstate Commerce Commission can accept it or reject it. The power is really in the Interstate Commerce Commission and not in the railroads at all.

Mr. SCOTT. No; I do not know anything of the kind. I know the railroads can fix up the tariffs and file them under the law with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FERRIS. And the Interstate Commerce Commission can change them.

Mr. SCOTT. Not until they are attacked. They must attack the tariff. They can not initiate the rate.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think that that language, if stripped of all flimsy fancy, means that the party fixes the rate who has the power to raise or lower the rate? To say that the Interstate Commerce Commission comes in and raises or lowers the schedule is, to my mind, nothing more than an application of the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission can state what the rate shall be. I can not grasp the technical views of the gentleman when he continues to argue who initiates the rate. To me it is a question of who has power to fix it, to change it; in short, to make it what it should be. The Interstate Commerce Commission can sweep them away or change them—lower or raise them.

Mr. SCOTT. There may be nothing in that contention. However, the railroad companies of this country for nearly 25 years thought there was a great deal in it, and they maintained constant litigation and contention over that point for years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. How much further time is desired on this section?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that I have two amendments to offer.

Mr. FERRIS. How much time does the gentleman desire? We must get on.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I do not believe it will be possible to arrange for closing the debate on the entire section at this time.

Mr. FERRIS. I think we ought to.

Mr. MONDELL. I have two amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MONDELL. No one knows how much time will be required on these amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I should like 10 minutes on the whole section.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest, if the gentleman from Minnesota is going to speak generally on the section, let him speak, and then let the gentleman from Wyoming offer his amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall ask five minutes on each of my amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. I wish the gentleman would let the amendments be read for information, and then let us fix the time. Is the gentleman willing to do that?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to send up my first amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] has the floor.

Mr. FERRIS. He yields for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I yield for that purpose, but not out of my time.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the two amendments of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] be read for information, so that we may then try to fix a limit of time on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks that the two amendments to be proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] be read for the information of the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. I have only one prepared, Mr. Chairman, which is to strike out, after the word "provided," in lines 2 and 3, on page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, after the word "provided," in line 3, strike out the following words: "That the physical combination of plants or lines for the generation, distribution, and use of power or energy under this act or under leases given hereunder may be permitted, in the discretion of the Secretary."

Mr. FERRIS. Is that the only amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming stated that he had two amendments.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not the other amendment prepared at this time.

Mr. FERRIS. Is the gentleman willing to close debate on this, and let the other one be offered and voted on?

Mr. MONDELL. If I can have 10 minutes, I am perfectly willing to take the 10 minutes on the two amendments when I offer the other one.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 30 minutes debate on this amendment and all amendments to this section be closed.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is very hot and oppressive to-day. We have hardly more than the membership of the gentleman's committee present.

Mr. FERRIS. We do not have to finish to-day. Let us get the debate closed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not press that.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to close debate on the amendment and all amendments to the section at the end of 30 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I shall have to object to that.

Mr. FERRIS. That will carry it only to 10 minutes after 5 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to close debate on this amendment and all amendments to the section in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] has one minute remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. What is the amendment to which the gentleman is speaking?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moved to strike out the last word, and he has one minute remaining, and he asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the legal status of this question has been discussed by my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] in a way that brought out some important legal questions. I do not believe that there is any doubt in the mind of any member of the committee as to the proposition that the National Government has control of the navigable rivers from the mouth to the source for the purpose of regulating commerce and navigation, and that Congress has an incidental right to provide for the erection of dams and to grant that right to others if it sees fit. If this is a correct statement of the law, then Congress has not the constitutional right to provide by law that the Secretary of the Interior or any other person may dispose of the water powers on the public domain located in any State of this Union.

In all acts authorizing State governments Congress has declared that the rivers therein or waters leading into the same shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to all other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor. Therefore by this reservation Congress reserves to itself the right to make all needful rules and regulations necessary to secure the navigability of the rivers of a State and the waters leading into these rivers and as the incidental right to permit dams to be erected in such rivers. Furthermore, it is contended, and I think rightly, that in granting a permit to erect a dam in a navigable river Congress has the right to exact certain conditions.

Hence it is quite evident that the Secretary of the Interior, who has the right to make all necessary rules and regulations concerning public land within a State, has no right to interfere with the flow of a navigable river or a stream entering into a navigable river that may pass through the public domain, unless Congress has the power to grant such right, and how can it be claimed that Congress has such power when Congress has expressly declared to the contrary in admitting the State to the Union?

This rule, of course, would not apply where reservoirs are erected upon the public domain or where the public domain has a stream that does not flow into a navigable river; but I take it that there are but few such reservoirs or streams, and the bill under consideration attempts to regulate both navigable rivers and streams entering into the same and reservoirs and purely local streams.

But by a tacit agreement between the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that has control of legislation affecting navigable streams, and the Committee on the Public Lands the constitutions of States are to be set aside and a divided control over hydroelectric development is to be established for the sake of harmony among the different departments of our Government, such as the Department of the Interior, the Secretary of War, as well as the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the Committee on the Public Lands, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, all to the detriment of hydroelectric development.

It would seem the part of wisdom to permit the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to have jurisdiction over the navigable rivers and the waters leading into the same, and that the Secretary of the Interior have jurisdiction over reservoirs and streams wholly within the public domain. Such a division of authority and control would have a logical basis. But the present method of dealing with the subject is illogical, unwise, and detrimental to the very object it seeks to accomplish.

Mr. RAKER. What particular thing in the bill relative to the disposition of the public land does the gentleman believe that Congress has not the power to dispose of?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It is my opinion that the waters in the rivers of a State belong to the State.

Mr. RAKER. This bill rejects all the waters in the State; it does not relate to them.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. These waters are all within the confines of the State, even though they are on the public domain, and the only power Congress has to legislate in matters of this kind it derives from its right to exercise jurisdiction over commerce and navigation. It is an incidental right on a navigable stream, and that navigable stream commences at its mouth and ends at it source. In the legislation proposed in the pending bill we are cutting that proposition right in two; we are turning over one half of the power of Congress over navigable rivers to the Interstate Commerce Committee and the Secretary of War and the other half to the Committee on the Public Lands and the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman take into consideration section 14 of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes; I am taking into consideration this bill and the bill that preceded it. It is practically the same sort of legislation, legislation on the same subject. We are dividing the proposition, making double work and accomplishing but little.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for one more question, and then I will not trouble him again? In that broad statement that Congress has the power in the general dam bill that was passed, known as the Adamson dam bill, over a river commencing at the mouth and running through all the various branches of the stream to the trickling spring in the mountain—if that is a fact, there would be no necessity for further legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Congress's authority over navigable streams is limited to navigation and rights incidental thereto. The other rights and benefits of the stream belong to the State. That is the proposition I lay down.

The bill under consideration provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered to issue leases under such terms, conditions, and general regulations as he may prescribe to construct, maintain, and operate dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works necessary and convenient to the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power within the boundary of the public domain; and these boundaries contain those headwaters and lands which the Adamson bill of the Interstate Commerce Committee placed under the control of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. Thus we have a divided control of navigable rivers and their headwaters.

The development of hydroelectric power has been in progress but 24 years. Therefore it is not surprising that we find such great difference of opinion as to what kind of legislation is necessary to develop this natural resource as rapidly as possible and at the same time protect the rights of those who use electric current. However, it should be apparent to anyone who has given the subject serious thought and consideration that the proposition is indivisible, and whatever law is passed for its regulation and control should be a unit.

Section 3 provides that different plants may combine, and in another section of the bill it is provided that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered to prescribe rates and service where the current enters into interstate commerce. When you give such power to an aggregation of allied hydroelectric-power corporations, such as the General Electric or the Stone & Webster, which may extend their operations over a stretch of adjoining States in a period in which, as stated by the Commissioner of Corporations, such electric group may operate over a contiguous area of 1,000 square miles, no one can effectively dispute their claim that current is interstate and that thereby, under the provisions of this bill, subject only to the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior.

Such a condition would render null and void all attempts of States and municipalities under present laws and charters to regulate such electric utilities. The public-service commissions of the public-land States, which attempt to regulate such utilities, would be put out of commission and their powers bestowed in lump upon the Secretary of the Interior, who, by nature of his location, can know little of local conditions and be in only a slight degree in touch with the great mass of local, State, and municipal consumers. They can not get to him in Washington to attend hearings and make statements of grievances, as now provided for in State and municipal laws and ordinances.

The practical working of this provision will be that in every State or city where there is an efficient local commission which looks after the local public interest and holds the public-service corporations strictly to account, and not to its liking, the corporation that does not like such local regulation under the eyes of the consumer will set up the excuse that its current is interstate, because its plant is combined or coupled up with other plants across the State boundary, as authorized by the combining of the plants.

The result is that instead of the government of the water power and public utilities of a State by a State commission, government by the Secretary of the Interior is substituted.

It has been urged by the authors of the pending bill that if it is enacted into law it will have a tendency to prevent and prohibit combinations and monopolies in the production and sale of electric current. It is quite apparent that it will have a contrary effect, because the hydroelectric trust can conveniently hide behind the inefficient control and regulation of current provided for in this measure.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman from Wyoming desire on his amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Ten minutes; but I would prefer to have it when we take up the bill the next time.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will consume that time now. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 30 minutes, 10 minutes of which will be consumed by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], debate shall close on this section and all amendments thereto. I think we have covered every conceivable phase of it. We reserve only 20 minutes for ourselves, and I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin wants part of that.

Mr. CLINE. Does that mean that we have to stay here for 30 minutes more to-night?

Mr. FERRIS. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the chairman will move to rise at the conclusion of the discussion of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FERRIS. That is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not care to use more than 5 minutes this evening.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think the gentleman ought to halt the debate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would suggest that, as the gentleman from Ohio would like to have 5 minutes, at the conclusion of his 5 minutes and of the discussion of the gentleman from Wyoming the chairman move to rise.

Mr. FERRIS. What does the gentleman desire to talk about?

Mr. FESS. I desire to address the committee on this constitutional phase.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 35 minutes the debate be closed on this section and all amendments thereto, 5 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and 10 minutes be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and 10 minutes by the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the understanding is that we rise at 5 minutes after 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to close debate upon the amendment in 35 minutes, 5 minutes of that time to be given to the gentleman from Ohio, 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, and 10 minutes to the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the one phase of greatest interest to me in the discussion this afternoon is this constitutional phase of the proposed bill. If this water power is to be developed on streams which are navigable or interstate, or if it is to be used as interstate power, although within a State, there is not any doubt about the constitutionality of it; nobody would question it for a moment, because it would be covered by that clause of the Constitution which gives power to regulate commerce, but I understand that much of this proposed development is to be done in public lands owned by the United States, and probably much of it entirely intrastate. That phase of it becomes of interest to me because the chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS] stated awhile ago that the Government could do anything that it wanted to on the public lands. That statement is very far-reaching and, I believe, unwarranted. I have been trying to get from the Constitution as I can see it the authority for the development of water power in streams that are wholly within public lands and not interstate, but intrastate.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Water power for hydroelectric energy is 24 years old. The Constitution is considerably older than that.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. And we are confronted with new conditions.

Mr. FESS. I admit that.

Mr. FERRIS. And the courts have passed upon it and our rights and the question of whether we have the power to develop water power in any way we like on our own lands, and we are consuming time on this for nothing, because that is absolutely settled and can not be denied.

Mr. FESS. I do not believe the chairman of the committee ought to take the position on this kind of a discussion of a constitutional phase that we are consuming time for nothing.

Mr. FERRIS. This question is so well settled and so uniformly understood one can hardly conceive of anybody questioning our right to do on our own lands what we want to do.

Mr. FESS. I know; but such a dogmatic statement as just now made by the chairman is not quite what ought to be made in the consideration of a piece of legislation in this House. The most important question is our right as given us by the Constitution, and every Member has a right to be convinced that what is done has the constitutional sanction of the organic law.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. The gentlemen are going to take all of my time. What does the gentleman wish?

Mr. RAKER. I want to know whether the gentleman has read the right-of-way acts passed by this Congress in relation to public lands and the provision for the rules and regulations to be controlled by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. FESS. I have read a good deal of what this Government has done in regard to its authority along the lines of Federal relations. I have been a teacher of constitutional law in a university and am fairly familiar with decisions touching this issue. I am not now seeking to be heard for the sake of consuming time, and I am not speaking in the air. Mr. Chairman, I hold that there is not any constitutional sanction for the position that the Government can do as it pleases in public lands within a State, and I doubt your authority for what you are attempting to do here on a stream that is wholly intrastate. The only authority is that particular clause of the Constitution which gives authority to the Congress to deal with Territories in its disposition of public lands, or in the making of rules and regulations governing Territories. But the question of control in the Constitution as there used by the makers did not refer to such matters as we are here discussing. It had nothing to do with the things we are talking about. There were two kinds of land when the Constitution was made—States and Territories. Thirteen were States, and the balance was the Northwest and Southwest Territories, out of which we have carved nine States, five from the Northwest and four from the Southwest. In order to give control over the organization of those Territories, out of which ultimately were carved nine States, this particular clause was put into the Constitution, and had little, if anything whatever, to do with what you are now discussing. The States existed before the Constitution of 1789; also the Territories were recognized before that date. In order to make it possible for a Territory to become a State the ordinance of 1787, which antedated the adoption of the Constitution, gave a plan by which a Territory could become a State, and this clause to which you are referring has reference to that particular Territory, which is the Northwest and the Southwest. I admit that power to operate in a Territory that is acquired must come from this clause; but I think no one will question that there is no power in the Constitution or in Congress that is not delegated by the people, and if there is any power to do what you propose to do it is to be found in the Constitution, either in express terms or by implication. What is not delegated to Congress is reserved to the States. If the Government admits a Territory over which it has plenary powers to the rights of statehood, then it forfeits its powers over such Territory not reserved. It is a serious question whether the Government owns the waters within the State, although lying wholly or partly within that part known as the public domain. At any rate, the Government's authority can not be construed to interfere with the rights of the State unless specifically designated.

To me it is a question of serious doubt whether the Congress can step over into the State under this particular clause to make the rules governing a Territory which applied to the organization of a Territory looking to its admission as a State—whether under that authority you have a right to step over into the State when the State has ceased to be a Territory and do as you please, as you say, without regard to the rights of the States. I seriously doubt that position. I do not believe it is warranted.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Does the gentleman recall the fact that this clause in the Constitution to which he is referring respects not only the territory but also other property of the United States?

Mr. FESS. Other property of the United States, such as, for example, the District of Columbia, lands for navy yards, docks, arsenals, and so forth.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. And such as public lands?

Mr. FESS. There were no public lands outside of the territory of the United States at this time, when the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the shipping bill that passed here a few days since.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the shipping bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the enhanced cost of sugar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the enhanced cost of sugar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the workingmen's compensation act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The rule provides for that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is on another proposition, and foreign to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the workingmen's compensation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, August 19, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16759) to require owners and lessees of amusement parks to furnish drinking water to patrons free of cost, etc., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1093), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13219) to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys in the District of Columbia, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1094), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) instructing American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture to present to the permanent committee for action at the general assembly in 1915 certain resolutions, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1095), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. HENSLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17895) for the relief of John Henry Gibbons, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1096), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WITHERSPOON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16823) to appoint Frederick H. Lemly a passed assistant paymaster on the active list of the United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1097), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KEATING: A bill (H. R. 18417) for the relief of certain desert-land entrymen; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GREEN of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 18418) to amend section 447 of the postal laws; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. VARE: A bill (H. R. 18419) directing the Bureau of Corporations of the Department of Commerce to ascertain the value of contracts entered into by citizens of the United States for supplying foodstuffs, etc., and empowering the President to prohibit the exportation of certain supplies; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 18420) to authorize the President, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, to suspend for a period of three months the act of February 8, 1875, levying a tax upon notes used for circulation by any person, firm, association (other than national bank associations), and corporations, State banks or State banking associations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KEATING: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 323) amending the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 18421) granting an increase of pension to Mary Press; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ANSBERRY: A bill (H. R. 18422) granting a pension to Volney A. Parmer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 18423) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin F. Patterson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18424) granting an increase of pension to William Pittman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 18425) granting a pension to Roena Cartwright; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GUDGER: A bill (H. R. 18426) granting a pension to George W. Davis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany a bill granting a pension to John B. Raines; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: Petitions of sundry citizens of Illinois relative to House joint resolution 282, to investigate claims of Dr. F. A. Cook to be discoverer of the North Pole; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, petition of officers of Local Union No. 598, United Mine Workers of America, of Lincoln, Ill., favoring clause exempting labor unions, etc., of the Clayton antitrust bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 19, 1914.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we can not be indifferent to the confusion of the world. While we enjoy the peace and prosperity of our own beloved land we can not but be reminded of the fearful consequences and widespread desolation that must follow the conflict across the seas. We lift our hearts to Thee for those nations involved. We pray especially for those who must bear the brunt of the struggle. Grant a speedy and permanent settlement of their difficulties in the way that Thou shalt choose. Unite the interests of men, and hasten the glad era of peace and sympathy and brotherhood, when men "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and nation shall not lift up the sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." We plead for this in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, August 11, 1914, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEATH OF MRS. WOODROW WILSON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received a card from the President addressed to the Members of the Senate of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The President and the members of his family greatly appreciate your gift of flowers and wish to express their sincere gratitude for your sympathy.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS (S. DOC. NO. 565).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 7th instant, information relative to the aggregate amount of money required for the proper maintenance of existing river and harbor projects for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, etc., which, on motion of Mr. BURTON, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

TRANSFER OF VESSELS FROM COASTWISE TRADE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, a copy of a letter and inclosure from the collector of customs at Philadelphia and of a telegram from the collector of customs at New York, giving further information as to the coastwise vessels available for foreign trade, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 4th instant, an additional telegram from the collector of customs, San Francisco, Cal., and a copy of an additional letter from the collector of customs, New York City, N. Y., together with an inclosed letter of the A. H. Bull Steamship Co., relative to vessels now in the coastwise trade which the owners would use in over-sea foreign trade in the present emergency, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

GENERAL EDUCATION BOARD AND CARNEGIE FOUNDATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, stating, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, that no employees of the Post Office Department are paid salaries in whole or in part out of funds contributed by the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, stating, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, that there are no employees in the Department of Agriculture whose salaries are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, stating, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, that no persons in the Department of Commerce are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by either the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Labor, stating, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, that the Department of Labor has no relations whatever with the organizations known as the General Education Board of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation, and that no persons in that department are paid in whole or in part with funds contributed by either of these foundations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6116) to amend section 195 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 654. An act to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes;

S. 5198. An act to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them a part of the Pike National Forest; and

S. J. Res. 178. Joint resolution granting authority to the American Red Cross to charter a ship or ships of foreign register for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of that society.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Norwalk, Conn., Washington, D. C., and Ness City, Kans., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Keota and Odebolt, in the State of Iowa; of East Liverpool and Attica, in the State of Ohio; and of Oakland, Cal., Francesville, Ind., Alton, Ill., and Gainesville, Mo., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented a petition of sundry citizens of Douglas, Wyo., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present a letter in the shape of a petition and ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the letter was read, as follows:

DALLAS, TEX., August 15, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Telegraphic advices announce President Wilson's disapproval of the American bankers' plan to float loans for the benefit of belligerent countries of Europe. That is good, and I hope his views will prevail.

Now, induce him to go a step further and place an embargo on the exportation of foodstuffs. You, of course, are fully apprised of the enormous jump in prices of food commodities since August 1. There have been no excessive exportations since August 1, consequently the supply in the United States must be greater to-day than on August 1, and yet prices are steadily advancing, and in advancing have curtailed consumption, further augmenting the supply.

From my viewpoint this Government owes nothing to the foreign nations, but everything to its own people. If an embargo should be placed upon foodstuffs, necessarily the firms who have gathered in the outputs of the farmers will find themselves confronted with the proposition to either hold it at a loss or sell at a fair profit. That they would unload, it seems a fair assumption, since the rate of interest having also advanced they will find themselves unable to cope with an embargo and the dearer money.

In this connection, if you will pardon the suggestion, while the Reserve Board and the Treasury are making every effort to furnish bankers of the country with money, they should also determine the maximum rate of interest it should be let at. Already the bankers in the large cities have raised the rate from 5 per cent to 7½ and 8 per cent. The bankers of Texas, so far as I understand, are holding to their normal rates. How long, though, they can withstand the position taken by the northern and eastern bankers is to be determined. It would be safe to conjecture, however, that as a mere matter of protection to themselves from overdemands they, too, will have to raise their rates. Whatever the case, the fact remains that it is an injustice to the very class the Government is seeking to aid—the producing class and the commercial interests dependent upon it.

With Government money at 2 per cent, secured with commercial paper at 75 per cent of its par value and reloaned at 6 and 8 per cent, or even better, we have a pyramiding process, and it is wrong.

The inability of the South to export its cotton as under ordinary circumstances will throw perhaps 7,000,000 bales on the country as a surplus, which surplus will unquestionably establish the price and value of the rest, to further depress the value of next year's crop. The South, therefore, will get approximately 50 per cent for its output, or, in other words, will receive a depreciated dollar, and, in addition, unless the exportation of foodstuffs is stopped and high prices are checked, she will pay 25 to 33⅓ per cent more for her provisions and be worsted all along the line, for her dollar under such adjustment will purchase about 35 per cent of commodities as under the conditions prior to the foreign war.

There is absolutely no sound reason why prices of commodities should advance. It is one of those unhappy "psychological" displays of man's greed which needs to be flattened out quickly.

I submit this for whatever consideration you may deem it worth.

Believe me, sir,

Yours, most obediently, JOHN SEVIER ALDEHOFF.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hettinger, Rudser, and Napoleon, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented petitions of the Foreign Missionary Society, the Woman's Home Missionary Society, and the Methodist Camp Meeting, of Plainville, Conn., and of the Methodist Episcopal Society and of the Baptist Society of Bantam, Conn., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMOOT. I received this morning from Philadelphia a telegram from the National Association of Retail Druggists in relation to House bill 6282. I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., August 18, 1914.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The National Association of Retail Druggists, in convention assembled, protests against the enactment into law of House bill 6282 in its present form. We approve your protest against withdrawing the words on page 5, after line 2, by which exemption is granted to physicians, dentists, and veterinarians. We most emphatically declare that in its present form the bill is misleading and will not to any material extent remedy the evils at which it is aimed. We urgently request that the Senate recall the bill and place all distributers of narcotics on an equal basis, and not allow the American people to be humbugged with such a bill as the present is.

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RETAIL DRUGGISTS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present a petition signed by many hundreds of the citizens of my State, praying Congress to give Dr. Frederick A. Cook an opportunity to prove that he discovered the North Pole, and, upon proof of that fact, to extend to him a proper and suitable recognition. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Everest, Troy, Salina, Norton, Formoso, Osborne, Colby, Wallace, Belleville, Selden, and Mankato, all in the State of Kansas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of the Grain Exchange of Omaha, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation to admit foreign-built and foreign-manned vessels to American registry, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of North Platte, Nebr., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to grant the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Commercial Club of Omaha, Nebr., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 120, International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, of Lincoln, Nebr., and a petition of Local Union No. 57, International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, of Omaha, Nebr., praying for the passage of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented a petition of sundry citizens of Waldo, Me., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS presented memorials of sundry citizens of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the passage of the Clayton antitrust bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Clovis and Mount Hermon, in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of the Chamber of Commerce of San Bernardino, Cal., praying that Congress obtain control of the Colorado River to prevent overflow of the Imperial and Yuma Valley lands, which were referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. THORNTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Louisiana, praying for the passage of the river and harbor bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHIVELY presented petitions of J. N. Johnson, principal of the Columbian School, and D. P. Barngrover, principal of the Meridian School, and of 116 other citizens of Kokomo, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation looking to the adjustment of the contention for the discovery of the North Pole, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented the memorials of August Haller, Henry Grimm, Henry J. Wolf, and 10 other citizens of Evansville, Ind., remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Greenville, Miss., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide financial assistance to the cotton growers of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRADY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 4920) to increase the cost of construction of Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 754) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was recommitted the bill (S. 647) to amend an act entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," approved April 23, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 302), as amended by the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 796), reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 750) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 6202. An act to repeal an act entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of May 1, 1888, and extend the provisions of section 2301 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to certain lands in the State of Montana embraced within the provisions of said act, and for other purposes" (Rept. No. 753);

H. R. 11840. An act for the relief of R. G. Arrington (Rept. No. 751); and

H. R. 16296. An act to provide for issuing of patents for public lands claimed under the homestead laws by deserted wives (Rept. No. 752).

CATCHING OF WHALES IN ALASKAN WATERS.

Mr. THORNTON. On behalf of the Committee on Fisheries, I ask to have taken from the calendar Order of Business 584, being the bill (S. 5283) to regulate the catching of whales in the waters of the Territory of Alaska, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Fisheries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Fisheries.

FORT BRIDGER MILITARY RESERVATION, WYO.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 92) to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation in Wyoming, and I submit a report (No. 755) thereon. It is a very short bill and entirely local in its application, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAWS OF ALASKA.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Territories I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 11740) to amend an act entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, and I submit a report (No. 749) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be reported.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that nothing in that act of Congress entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, shall be so construed as to prevent the courts now existing or that may be hereafter created in said Territory from enforcing within their respective jurisdictions all laws passed by the legislature within the power conferred upon it, the same as if such laws were passed by Congress, nor to prevent the legislature passing laws imposing additional duties, not inconsistent with the present duties of their respective offices, upon the governor, marshals, deputy marshals, clerks of the district courts, and United States commissioners acting as justices of the peace, judges of probate courts, recorders, and coroners, and providing the necessary expenses of performing such duties, and in the prosecuting of all crimes denounced by Territorial laws the costs shall be paid the same as is now or may hereafter be provided by act of Congress providing for the prosecution of criminal offenses in said Territory, except that in prosecutions growing out of any revenue law passed by the legislature the costs shall be paid as in civil actions and such prosecutions shall be in the name of the Territory.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 6340) for the relief of James M. Morgan; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LEA of Tennessee:

A bill (S. 6342) to appropriate $10,000 to build a hotel at Shiloh National Military Park, in the State of Tennessee; and

A bill (S. 6343) for the relief of John Patrick; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 6344) for the relief of George Braden (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 6345) granting an increase of pension to Augustus Joyeux; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 6346) granting a pension to John W. Stults (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 6347) granting a pension to Edward J. Gainan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 6348) for the relief of certain desert-land entrymen; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 6349) to make the Federal reserve notes issued by the United States full legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A bill (S. 6350) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Scott; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 6351) granting an increase of pension to George H. Lewis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 6352) granting an increase of pension to James M. Tackett; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 6353) granting an increase of pension to Albert F. Wright (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 6354) granting an increase of pension to Hester Morse;

A bill (S. 6355) granting an increase of pension to Frank S. Milcham; and

A bill (S. 6356) granting an increase of pension to David M. Hilton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LIPPITT:

A bill (S. 6358) granting an increase of pension to Mary T. Ryan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 182) to appropriate $6,000 to defray the expenses of the United States rifle team to the Pan-American shooting tournament at Lima, Peru, December 9 to 24, 1914; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 183) for control and distribution of the flood waters of the Rio Grande; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

GRAIN WAREHOUSES.

Mr. GORE. I introduce a bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license grain warehouses, and for other purposes. I desire to call the attention of Senators from grain-growing and grain-marketing States to this measure, and ask them to take it under consideration at once.

The bill (S. 6339) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license grain warehouses, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SALE OF EUROPEAN WAR BONDS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to introduce a bill concerning the reference of which I am in some doubt. It is a bill to prohibit the sale or offering for sale or the purchase or delivery in the United States of bonds or securities issued by Governments at war and issued since the war began. I think it is important that there should be some legislation on this subject, that the matter should not be left to mere Executive discretion, and that the United States should adopt a definite policy not only in the interest of peace to supply no funds to countries at war while the war is in progress, but also to keep at home the capital which may otherwise be drained to foreign countries during a war. I shall ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as it relates to neutrality.

The bill (S. 6341) to prohibit the sale in the United States of certain bonds issued by foreign Governments engaged in war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask to introduce an emergency bill, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Commerce. I also ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without being read.

The bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department.

Whereas the foreign commerce of the United States is now greatly impeded and endangered through the absence of adequate facilities for the insurance of American vessels and their cargoes against the risks of war; and

Whereas it is deemed necessary and expedient that the United States shall temporarily provide for the export shipping trade of the United States adequate facilities for the insurance of its commerce against the risks of war: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of war risk insurance, the director and employees of which shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury; the salary of the director shall be $6,000 per annum, and the salaries of the other employees shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in no case to exceed $5,000 per annum for any employee: Provided, That all employees receiving a salary of $3,000 per annum or less shall be subject to the civil-service laws and regulations thereunder.

SEC. 2. That the said bureau of war risk insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable, make provisions for the insurance of American vessels, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war, wherever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels or shippers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on terms of substantial equality with the vessels or shippers of other countries because of the protection given such vessels or shippers by their respective Governments through war-risk insurance.

SEC. 3. That the bureau of war risk insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to adopt and publish a form of war-risk policy, and to fix reasonable rates of premium for the insurance of American vessels and their cargoes against war risks, which rates shall be subject to such change, to each country and for each class, as the Secretary shall find may be required by the circumstances. The proceeds of the aforesaid premiums when received shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the bureau of war risk insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have power to make any and all rules and regulations necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish an advisory board, to consist of three members skilled in the practices of war risk insurance, for the purpose of assisting the bureau of war risk insurance in fixing rates of premium and in adjustment of claims for losses; the compensation of the members of said board to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. In the event of disagreement as to the claim for losses, or amount thereof, between the said bureau and the parties to such contract of insurance, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States in the district court of the United States, sitting in admiralty, in the district in which the claimant or his agent may reside.

SEC. 6. That the director of the bureau of war risk insurance, upon the adjustment of any claims for losses in respect of which no action shall have been begun, shall, on approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, promptly pay such claim for losses to the party in interest; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to make provision for the speedy adjustment of claims for losses and also for the prompt notification of parties in interest of the decisions of the bureau on their claims.

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of paying losses accruing under the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000.

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the bureau of war risk insurance, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000.

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized to suspend the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. KENYON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SECURITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS.

Mr. WHITE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I call up from the table Senate joint resolution 181, authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the contractor for building locks on Black Warrior River to proceed with the work without interruption to completion.

Mr. BURTON. What measure is that?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is a joint resolution?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it will have to go to the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not necessarily.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. The rule so provides. If it were a Senate resolution, it could be acted upon by unanimous consent, but this is a joint resolution, and it must be referred.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am asking the Senate to consider the joint resolution and pass it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is just the same as a bill, and all bills must be referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is objection, the joint resolution will have to go to the committee. It will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on August 18, 1914, approved and signed the following act:

S. 110. An act to tax the privilege of dealing on exchanges, boards of trade, and similar places in contracts of sale of cotton for future delivery, and for other purposes.

TRAFFIC IN OPIUM.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

LANDS IN DENVER, COLO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5197) granting public lands to the city and county of Denver, in the State of Colorado, for public park purposes, which were, on page 5, line 17, to strike out "grant" and insert "sale," and on page 5, line 17, to strike out "made" and insert "authorized."

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

STEAM LAUNCH "LOUISE."

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5739) to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government, which was, on page 1, line 9, after "Government," to strike out all down to and including "Republic," in line 12.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE, ALABAMA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5977) to authorize Bryan and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala., which were, on page 1, line 3, after "Bryan," to insert "Henry"; on page 1, line 4, to strike out ", when authorized by the State of Alabama"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize Bryan Henry and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COTTON WAREHOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the bill (S. 6206) to authorize the Secretahy of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes. It is an emergency measure, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Georgia to let the bill go over for to-day. I have another matter which I want to look into in connection with the bill, and if the Senator will allow the bill to go over I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will wait until to-morrow, when I shall try to get the bill considered.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I make the suggestion that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is an amendment of the committee, in section 7, page 7, line 12, to strike out the word "consumers."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I voted to strike from the bill section 2 and section 4. Certain Senators were absent from the Senate when the motions were carried eliminating those sections. While I still favor striking those sections from the bill, at their request I make the motion to reconsider the votes by which that was done, and ask that the motion go over until the conclusion of the consideration of the committee amendments, then to be taken up. In order to be within my parliamentary rights I make the motion to-day to reconsider the votes by which those two sections were stricken from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina move to reconsider the vote to which he refers, or does he enter a motion to reconsider?

Mr. OVERMAN. I enter the motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED. To reconsider the vote by which section 2 and section 4 were agreed to?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED. The form which the Senator's motion takes is to enter a motion to reconsider?

Mr. OVERMAN. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote. The understanding is that the motion is not to be taken up at this time, because I wish the Senate to go on with the bill. I repeat, I am still in favor of striking those sections from the bill, but some Senator who voted in favor of striking them out will have to enter the motion to reconsider. I therefore enter the motion to-day, in order that I may not lose my right to do so.

Mr. REED. Very well. I desire to call up the matter to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out the word "consumers" in line 12, page 7, section 7, of the bill as reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of striking out the word "consumers" will rise. [A pause.] All those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I transfer that general pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. Not seeing him in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I am requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea." If it should develop that my vote is necessary to make a quorum, I will take the liberty of voting.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I make this announcement for this legislative day.

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (after having voted in the affirmative). I neglected to announce my pair when I voted. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to inquire whether the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withdraw my vote, having a general pair with him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am requested to announce the pairs between the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and between the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

I will also state that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is necessarily detained from the Senate, and that the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] is detained at his home because of serious illness in his family. I will let this statement stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 14, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

BLACK RIVER BRIDGE, MISSOURI.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Out of order I ask permission to report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. 6315) to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River, and I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It simply provides for the construction of a bridge out in my State, and there are some reasons to get it through at once. It is an absolutely unimportant measure except as it is important to the particular locality affected by it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, can that be done without laying aside the regular order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not see how it can be done without laying aside the pending bill. It can be laid aside by unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. REED. It was done yesterday by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to yield for the consideration of the bill, since the Senator from Missouri says it is an emergency measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether or not the status of the bill is such that I can move at this time to strike out section 7?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not until the committee amendments have been disposed of, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Is the bill before the Senate now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The opinion of the Chair is that, as the unfinished business was laid aside and consent was given to take up the bill in which the Senator from Missouri was interested, technically speaking the trust bill is not before the Senate until permission has been obtained to put it before the Senate again.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill may be presented to the Senate for consideration. I desire to say in this connection that, it being clearly against the spirit of the rule, in my judgment, I must refrain from consenting to lay it aside for the consideration of emergency measures while the bill is pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "orders, or associations."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what I have to say upon this bill may as well be said upon this amendment as upon any other particular feature, and I shall ask the attention of the Senate for a very few moments only.

David, the Psalmist, says:

> Nevertheless, they did flatter me with their mouths and lied unto me with their lips.

For the benefit of Senators generally I will say that that language will be found in the Seventy-eighth Psalm, at the thirty-sixth verse. I quote it because I consider that it is exceedingly applicable to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. President, on the 4th day of July, 1776, a band of patriots had gathered in this land. They were the wise men of their day. They were the great scholars and philosophers of their time. They lived in the morn of a great political awakening, when the divine rights of kings were being questioned and the God-given rights of man were being proclaimed.

If, on the one hand, they were lacking in many acquirements which modern science and progress have opened to the human mind, they had escaped, on the other hand, the thousands of questions which arise to vex us in our present advanced civilization, and therefore had the leisure to direct their research into the realms of governmental philosophy. They were versed in the history of the world. They knew the abuses of monarchial governments and the weaknesses of democracies. They were neither sycophants nor demagogues. They flattered neither the king nor the citizen.

They were met a great body of wise men on a solemn occasion. They were to lay the foundation of a new government. They were to place as its corner stone a mighty principle for which men could lay down their lives; and these were the words they wrote:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these [equal] rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

That all men are created equal and endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights rang to the world the birth of a new principle that should thenceforth be the basis of all civil and political governments. The lowly toiler heard it and raised his head in the pride of his right. The Slavic serf heard it and raised his shackled arms for the blow that should sever his chains. The impulsive sons of France heard it and planted the tree of liberty which, though hacked and bruised, still spreads its sturdy branches to every political tempest. The world heard it and felt the heart throbs of a new inspiration. Around that mighty principle we rallied the patriotism of our colonial fathers. For that principle they suffered and died. Orators have proclaimed and scholars have expounded the meaning of those words, but none clearer than our own Lincoln, when he declared that they do not mean that we are equal in intelligence or character or color but in our rights—our equal rights—under the law.

For 138 years we have maintained a Government based upon the equality of each and every citizen. For 138 years we have maintained a Government based upon the principle that every law shall operate with equal force upon every person; that none shall be too powerful to be above the restrictions of the law and none too lowly to be deprived of its protection.

With that principle written upon our national banner and given expression in every legislative act since the beginning of our Government, our progress has astounded the world, and the success of our free Government has belied all the prophecies of the downfall of our republican form of government.

To-day, while monarchies and republics are in a death struggle in the Old World, while the issue of imperialism and democracy, militarism and nonmilitarism are reddening the plains of Europe with the blood of millions of men, we, the great exponent of individual equality of citizenship under the law, we who founded our Government on that principle, have taken the first backward step. We for the first time have declared to our own people and to the world that our laws shall not operate with equal force on all our people; that an act committed by one class or individual shall be an offense, but when committed by another class or individual shall not be an offense. We, the originators of the great principle, are the first to strike a blow to that principle of equality.

You excuse this on the ground that such legislation is in the interest of labor. I deny it. You say you are the friend of the laboring man. I say you are his worst enemy. He who proposes to give me rights that are not allowed to my fellow citizen is not my friend. He who flatters me with a declaration that I am entitled to rights not granted to every other citizen flatters me with his mouth and lies unto me with his lips. You know and I know that when I begin to exercise a right that is not accorded to my fellow citizen you outlaw me from the sympathy and good will of that citizen. You know that the sentiment of the people will not long stand for this principle of inequality. It is repugnant to human nature and doubly repugnant to the American idea.

Nor is this all. Human nature is the same in every walk of life. Privileges exercised by the titled aristocracy of France brought on the first French revolution, when the incessant stroke of the guillotine wiped out the recipients of special privileges. Class inequality can not long continue in this land; the American people will not stand for it, though you clothe it with legislative sanction. Mr. President, justice and equality are not the strongest impulses of the human heart. Selfishness preponderates over both. Justice and equality are maintained in the world only by laws which recognize and enforce them. Withdraw the law of equality and injustice will always prevail.

What is the duty of the Government toward the American laborer? The first duty is to so legislate and conduct the internal affairs of the Government and so regulate our commercial relations with foreign Governments as to give the greatest possible employment to American labor. Give the American laborer the American market and you will show him an act of true friendship a thousandfold more valuable to him than any special privilege could possibly ever be. Giving him rights or exempting him from obligations that are not accorded or exempted to others does not create a demand for the only thing he has to sell in the market—his skill and his strength.

There is no living man possessing ordinary human sentiments who does not want to speed the day when labor will reap its legitimate reward, its legitimate wage in every article produced by that labor; who will not wish to speed the day when inequalities between the several kinds of labor and between labor and business vocations generally shall be wiped away and when the only difference in the wage or earnings of all classes shall be measured by the time used in the preparation for the labor, the hours employed, and the skill required.

But you secure none of these by destroying the very life principle of our Government—equality under the law. I know there are a great many labor leaders who believe that they are solving all inequalities by securing exemptions from liabilities. It may be that some temporary advantage may be secured, but it will be temporary only. The legislator who says to a laboring man, "We have authorized you to do acts which we have made criminal when committed by others," flatters him to his injury.

There is no question here presented against organization of labor. Without this new law laborers have organized and still maintain their organization. Their rights are not dependent upon this law. They may do any lawful thing under the present law to effectuate their purpose and better the conditions of labor, both as to wages and as to conditions and environments. They can strike whenever they believe their wages are not sufficient. They can strike to shorten hours of labor. They can enforce every one of their just demands through organized effort.

I know there are those on this floor who insist that nothing else is secured by this act; but, Mr. President, no matter how cunningly devised, this bill does go further. It gives authority to destroy the property rights of others in order to enforce demands. If it does not do this, if it gives no rights in advance of what the law now gives, then why is it placed in this bill? If it does not do so, then it is a piece of deception, a fraud upon those whose interest you declare you are furthering. There is no question but that you attempt to legalize the secondary boycott.

I do not believe that the great mass of American laborers are asking for this un-American legislation. I believe the sentiment of equality under the law is just as strong with them as with any other class of people. I believe they are endowed with too much good sense and judgment ever to believe that an unjust, unequal law can work ultimate good to them.

Mr. President, another feature of this proposed law is the destruction of judicial authority. A subservient judiciary is destructive of human freedom. The judiciary of our country must ever stand as a balance to check the tendencies of the executive to usurp the functions of the legislative branch. It must ever stand guard over the ancient and traditional rights of the individual and shield him from unlawful injury and his property from destruction or confiscation.

The executive power can shield itself through the use of the agencies of the Government. The whole Army and Navy are at its disposal and subject to its command. The legislative arm can, in a degree, shield itself through its control over the revenues of the Government. The courts can only protect themselves through the power to enforce their judgments, and the only process by which it can enforce its writs and its orders is through proceedings for contempt. To deprive it of that power destroys its use and deprives the individual citizen of the only power of maintaining his civil and political rights. There are no people in this country who are more deeply concerned in maintaining the constitutional power of the courts than are our laboring people. Paralyze the arm of the court, and a tyrannical power will take its place in the future, as it has always taken its place in the past, and the laboring man ought to know that tyranny always ranges itself on the side of wealth and power. Let every laboring man pause before he strikes the protector of his own liberties.

I am making no objection to any procedure that shall require those things which are merely condemnatory of the court's action to be submitted to a jury. On the contrary, I am liberal enough to believe that if the court has the power to enforce all its judgments it need not pay very much attention to criticism against the authority that it is exercising. In other words, I do not believe honest criticism of judicial action, no matter how severe, should ever be regarded as a contempt.

Mr. President, this is a country governed by law and not by men. You can not deprive the court of its constitutional right to make its judgments effective. You may limit it and change its procedure, but you can not, by legislative act, deprive it of the means of enforcing its constitutional power. If A obtains a judgment against B through proceedings at law or in equity, you can not submit the question of the right of A to enforce his judgment to any jury. If A demands a writ of execution and B obstructs the execution of that writ, you can not compel A to submit to a jury whether he should allow B to continue the obstruction; and it is immaterial what the form of the obstruction and whether directed against an execution or injunction.

Mr. President, this deception practiced upon the laborer is bad enough, but you seek to cover up the vice of class legislation by increasing the size of the class, and so you say that the farmers shall also be exempt from the provisions of the trust law.

Why should you include farmers? You just now voted out a provision that the consumers might also be exempted. You say the consumers shall not be exempted from the trust laws; that they can not organize to protect themselves against exorbitant prices and charges. Why do you insist that they should be prohibited from so organizing? Their organization would not affect laborer, farmer, or manufacturer, but would only be directed against exorbitant retail prices.

Mr. President, what farmer has ever asked you to exempt him from a general law which declares that a certain act shall be an offense against public policy? I want to say to this Senate, in defense of that great class of toilers in our fields, the American farmers, that the farmer is American through and through, imbued with the American idea of equality; and even if he could obtain a special benefit from such legislation, from a law that would give him a right that the blacksmith and the grocer would not have, he would spurn the advantage; and if he would spurn that offer of advantage, you may be sure of his contempt for the sop you offer him. In the one instance you insult his sense of justice; in the other, his intelligence; and this seems to have been your attitude for a number of years. You have played the laboring man against the farmer and the farmer against the laboring man. You have declared in your political campaigns that you would reduce the price of the farmer's product to the laboring man; that you would give him cheaper food; you would give him cheaper eggs and butter, meat and flour. To the farmer you have declared that you would maintain his prices against the laborer and yet give him cheaper machinery and clothing and other articles of consumption. You have flattered them both with your mouths and lied unto them both with your lips.

There are 33,000,000 people in the United States engaged in farming. At least 30,000,000 of them are raising eggs. They are raising them on nearly every section of land from Canada to Mexico and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They are selling those eggs every day over all of this vast territory to 70,000,000 customers. Tell me, then, how these egg producers can proceed to fix the price of eggs. You know they can not do it; and you know further that, being fearful that eggs might reach a price satisfactory to the farmer, you opened wide the bars for the free admission of all of the eggs of all of the hens on the face of the earth; and having by your laws placed the farmer where you know and where he knows it is impossible for him to combine to fix the price of his eggs, you laconically turn to him and say: "You can fix your own prices; we have exempted you from the law against combinations in restraint of trade." What is true of eggs is true of poultry and grain and meat and wool and practically everything the farmer produces. After you have placed him at the mercy of the whole world, then you serenely tell him he can fix his own prices for his crops.

You have not reduced the price of a single thing that the farmer purchases. Why? Because you know that the protection accorded any ordinary article in the shape of a duty is so infinitesimal when compared with the retail price of the articles that it is seldom taken into consideration at all. The ultimate consumer never recognizes the change. While eggs and butter in my State have gone down by reason of the lack of protection the great bulk of laborers throughout the United States have had no advantage of that reduction, and that is true of their meats and their flour and all other food products. Though our barley went down about 50 per cent the products of barley have remained substantially unchanged. Though our oats dropped 50 per cent in value, your laborer pays the same old price for a package of Quaker Oats.

Of course the great war raging in Europe has made many changes in the value of farm and other products for which you are in no way responsible. If our people have had some loss by reason of this war, it is not your fault. If it has given us some benefits, it is not due to the virtue of your policies. I can only say that you are exceedingly lucky that the war diverts the attention of the great American public from the political and industrial conditions brought about by your tariff revision, and which were becoming more and more stringent until the foreign demand was increased by that war.

The American farmer is not asking you for any favors. He is asking you for justice, and when you give him that he will excuse you from legislating any special rule exempting him from the laws of the land.

You have attempted, and I think successfully, in this bill to legalize a system that can not be but regarded as pernicious by all right-thinking men. The farmer, you know well enough, as I have stated, can not fix the price of his product to the laboring man. The laboring man, through his organization, can, with the assistance of this law, enforce the thing he has to sell as against the farmer. And right here, the farmer who must hire labor can not forget that while by law you have prohibited the importation of laborers, to the end that labor may not become too plentiful, and therefore remain more valuable, you have, on the other hand, invited the products of all the world to make the farmer's product more than plentiful, and therefore less valuable. The farmer can not send his agent and say to every other farmer and to every grocer, "Do not sell to this laboring man, he is not our friend." His effort would be laughed at as the folly of all follies. But how about the farmer who has a field of wheat which is ripe or an orchard of fruit which needs immediate gathering? Before his gate the agent of the laborer may walk back and forth, under the provisions of this bill, with impunity, bearing a placard: "Boycott this farmer. He works 16 hours a day and demands that his employees shall work 10 hours. See that his crops shall rot. He has committed no act against us, but insists that he ought to employ his labor at such a price as will enable him to support his family. Let us see to it that such audacity has its due and proper punishment." Of course, I have no fear of any such acts against the farmers of my State. They are every one of them courageous, and the placard artist would not long remain at that farmer's gate.

I do not question for one moment the right of the laborer, organized or unorganized, to declare that he will not accept employment under this farmer unless such employment is restricted to eight hours per day and to such a price as he himself may fix, but I do deny his right to institute a boycott against this farmer or against his neighbor whose only crime is that he loaned to the farmer his son to help him save a little of his year's labor. If I am right as to the farmer, I am right in every other line of business. There can be no principle that is unjust when applied to the farmer that the farmer at least will not consider unjust when applied to others.

You can just leave the American farmer out of this bill. If you want to be sincere with the American farmer, if you want to be just with the American farmer, give him the American market for 10 years as you have given the same to the merchant or manufacturer for 50 years. He has earned these markets. You deprive him of those markets. You depress the value of his products. You subject him to the competition of the whole world in his own country, and then you add insult to that injury by telling him he need not obey the law prohibiting combinations to fix his prices. If you fool him with that sop, then I shall admit that I have overestimated the intelligence of the farming public.

I shall hope, Mr. President, that we will at least strike out the words "agricultural and horticultural associations" from this bill and leave the farmer where he can hold up his head and look straight into the eye of every other American citizen, capitalist and laborer, and say, "I am your equal and you are not more than my equal under the laws of the land."

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to ask the Senator a question. The Senator's State is almost exclusively an agricultural State. I wish to ask him whether there is any demand among the farmers of his State for any exemption of this character?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no demand among the farmers of my State or any other State, so far as I know, for this unequal legislation.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly on the labor-union exemption clause in the Clayton bill.

The Sherman Antitrust Act was passed in 1890, for the purpose of preventing industrial monopoly. It was frankly aimed at the "trusts," those great industrial combinations which were controlling various branches of interstate commerce through restraint of trade, greatly to the profit of their stockholders and much to the disadvantage of citizens at large. Familiar examples were the Standard Oil Co. and the American Sugar Refining Co.

At that time no one imagined that labor unions or farmers' associations would come within the act. No abuses from such organizations challenged attention.

But subsequently the language of the act was tortured into a meaning that has worked much hardship on workingmen and farmers. From an instrument which was intended for the relief of the plain people, it is transformed into an instrument for their oppression.

Section 7 of the pending bill is intended to place "labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations" outside the provisions of the Sherman Act. In other words, such organizations are left to be dealt with at the common law. No matter what they do they can not be punished as "illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws." Their members do not come in conflict with the antitrust laws as long as they carry out the legitimate objects of their organizations by "lawful" means.

Some of the legitimate objects of an agricultural organization are fair terms of shipment and sale of the products of its members, fair prices, and prompt collections. Some of the legitimate objects of a labor organization are fair wages, reasonable working hours, and wholesome conditions of labor.

In the attainment of these objects labor and farming organizations are not to be restrained by the antitrust laws so long as they act "lawfully." An act will be lawful in this connection unless it is prohibited by some special statute or by the common law.

For example, a labor union may vote to call its members out on strike to force higher wages, shorter hours, or better sanitary conditions. Its members may use peaceful persuasion to induce other workmen to join them, but any attempt at violence, coercion, threats, or intimidation would be "unlawful," and bring them into conflict with the antitrust laws.

The usual case of a strike or a boycott would present no difficulty, but when the regions of sympathetic strikes and secondary boycotts are reached opinions may differ. My own opinion is that so long as only peaceful means are resorted to, so long as there are no threats, no intimidations, no violence, no coercion, so long as the objects sought are the eventual good of the members of the unions, the acts are lawful. But the courts must decide when the facts are in dispute, or when the acts are close to the line.

But whether the acts constitute a restraint of trade will be immaterial if the bill passes in its present form.

Some distinguished Senators believe that labor unions do not now come within the provisions of the Sherman Act. How they can hold to this view in the face of Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S., 274) I do not understand, but it makes little difference here. If they believe it does not cover labor organizations, they can not object if the point is definitely settled. At all events, labor unions and their friends will be much relieved to know certainly that they are not to be classed with the Standard Oil Co. and the Sugar Trust.

But there is another class of persons who believe that labor organizations are prohibited by the Sherman Act and who vigorously oppose the exemption contained in the pending bill. I have had many letters and telegrams from men of this class. They may be referred to broadly as "capitalists."

Capitalists oppose this exemption of labor unions for a real reason. They wish to deprive organized labor of its only efficient weapon. But they proffer as an argument the proposition that the exemption of labor unions is "class legislation." I freely concede that it is class legislation, but I can not see why class legislation is not in this case highly proper and desirable. Let us see.

With the advent of steam, manufacturing was diverted from the workman's cottage to the factory. At the outset every employer of labor was permitted to run his business as he pleased. He fixed the hours of labor, he fixed the wages, he hired women and children, he guarded his machinery or he left it unprotected, he paid much or little attention to sanitary conditions, he made conditions hard or easy. No one undertook to prescribe any limits to his power and authority. Manufacturers look back to those early days as the days of the "old freedom."

At the beginning the capitalist lived near his mill; he knew his help and their families; he took pride in having his town or village prosperous, in having his employees well fed and well dressed. His own sons and daughters worked at the loom and in the countingroom. They intermarried with the families of the workingmen. There was one speech, one purpose, one prosperity, one God.

But some employers grow greedy. Some were cruel and inhuman. They worked longer hours than their rivals; they paid smaller wages; they employed more women and younger children; they provided less safeguards; they spent less on sanitary improvements. Such men secured an industrial advantage over their competitors.

And then the community exercised its power of protecting itself. It prescribed the conditions under which manufacturers might conduct business. It provided penalties by fine and imprisonment for those who disobeyed the labor laws.

In most States the first interference with the liberty of the capitalist took the form of limiting the number of hours of labor in mills for women and children. At first the limit was placed at 60 or even 72 hours per week. In the District of Columbia the present Congress has limited the hours of labor for women and children to 48 hours per week. The measure passed this Senate and the House without a dissenting vote. No one has questioned the right of Congress to pass the law; few have questioned the wisdom and policy of the law.

But in this law for the protection of women and children in the District of Columbia, enacted so easily, are contained all the elements of class legislation which are inveighed against so roundly in the discussion of the labor-union exemptions in the Clayton bill.

In the first place, the 48-hour law is frankly "class legislation," for it applies only to women and children. Women and children are made a class apart from adult males, and the law applies only to this particular class.

More than that, the law does not apply to all women and children. It is confined to those women and children who work in factories and stores. It does not apply to women and children who work on farms or at housework. Here again the law is limited to a certain class of a certain class—to those women and children who work in factories and stores.

It is readily seen that class legislation is very common, and very desirable in many cases. Many laws have been passed in the various States of a similar nature, such as child-labor laws applying only to children, to children employed in certain pursuits, and to children of a certain age. Here are three class distinctions; but who says that child-labor laws are void or wrong because they are "class legislation"?

There is the "phossy jaw" law, applying only to the class which makes lucifer matches; the sanitary-inspection law, applying only to factories; the boiler-inspection law, applying to a certain class of power plant; the milk-inspection law, applying to a certain class of food; the betterment-tax law, applying only to real estate of a certain class, and so on, indefinitely.

A good illustration of "class legislation" is found in the income-tax law passed during the present Congress. All persons having an income below a certain sum are placed in one "class"; married men are placed in a different "class" from unmarried ones; and there are numerous "classes" with different rates of tax, graded according to the amount of income.

The only constitutional provision is, not that all classes shall be treated alike, but that all persons of a designated class shall be treated alike. Few will dispute these propositions.

The dispute comes not in the power of Congress to pass class legislation, but in the wisdom and policy of the particular legislation under consideration. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe it is wise to make the provisions of the Sherman Act much more drastic as applied to combinations of capital in restraint of trade, for the evils springing from such combinations are great and increasing. But I am equally certain that labor organizations are a good thing, and they should be encouraged rather than embarrassed by Federal laws.

A very good case may be made out, in the way of a distinction between labor and capital, as was done by Judge Furman, of the Oklahoma court, in State v. Coyle (130 Pac. Rept., 316), but I am content to rest my vote on the broad proposition that public policy is best served by exempting labor unions from the operation of an "antitrust" act.

The time may come when labor unions may oppress their employers or may act in such a way as to procure for their members more than their fair share of what is produced in the Nation. I believe that that time is not here yet, and if it is ever to come, it is a long way in the future.

But if that time shall ever come, let organized labor have a hearing, and fair consideration, and a law of its own. Let it be regulated by a statute that shall apply to its peculiar conditions and aims, its special advantages, and its special weaknesses. Let it not be insulted by being classed with malefactors of great wealth.

It would be funny, if it were not so unjust and pathetic, to picture the humble wage earner, paying his few cents a week for the protection of his trades-union, congratulating himself that the antitrust law will save him from the high prices imposed by monopoly, and suddenly realizing that he is himself classed with the monopolists and trust managers, and liable, like them, to fine and imprisonment under an antitrust act. This joke is hugely relished, no doubt, by monopolists and their attorneys, but it is the duty and the privilege of the Congress of the United States to put an end to all jokes and jokers of this character.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks with reference to this section of the bill, although I am not at this moment prepared to make any comprehensive or detailed argument. Still, I do not want the occasion to pass without submitting some of the reasons why I think this legislation is both necessary and wise.

First, I desire to direct my remarks to arguments which have been made on the other side of the Chamber with reference to the viciousness of class legislation. It is a strange thing to me that a Republican Senator should have the temerity to denounce class legislation, inasmuch as the existence of the Republican Party since it came into being has depended upon its ability to deliver class legislation.

I hold in my hand a book containing the Republican platform of 1908, and I find in it this language under the caption "Help to workers":

> The wise policy which has induced the Republican Party to maintain protection to American labor, to establish the eight-hour day in the construction of all public work, to increase the list of employees who shall have preferred claims for wages under the bankruptcy law, to adopt a child-labor statute for the District of Columbia, to direct the investigation into the condition of the working women and children and later of the employees of telephone and telegraph companies engaged in interstate business, to appropriate $150,000 at the recent session of Congress in order to secure a thorough inquiry into the causes of loss of life in the mines, and to amend and strengthen the law prohibiting the importation of contract labor will be pursued in every legitimate direction in Federal authority to lighten the burdens and increase the opportunity for happiness and the advancement of all who toil.

So, you can go through every declaration of the Republican Party set forth in its various platforms almost from the birth of that party down to the date of its last convention and you will find that it justifies enormous tariff exactions on the theory that the high prices made necessary by those exactions, going into the pockets of the manufacturer, are to be by him doled out to the American laboring man. If forbidding the American people to purchase their goods where they can purchase them cheapest and compelling them to purchase from a selected class of individuals is not class legislation, I am at a loss to know what class legislation is.

While we are speaking of class legislation, where could we find a more beautiful illustration of the ease with which class legislation is accepted when certain powerful interests are involved than the spectacle exhibited in this body the other day, when a statutory monopoly was permitted to continue its exactions, permitted to continue to mulct the American people for carrying their goods, even in the face of a great exigency, a great war emergency? Here was a little selected class of American citizens who have the privilege of operating vessels plying from port to port in the United States, while an American ship, flying the American flag, sailing from the port of Liverpool, for example, to the port of New York and discharging her cargo there can not pick up another cargo at the port of New York and carry it to a Gulf port in order to pay its expenses for that part of the trip, but must confine its operations to American commerce transported abroad. Why? Because if it were permitted to engage in the coastwise trade it would interfere with the privilege of a class of American citizens who own and operate coastwise ships and a class of American citizens who build those ships for those men to own and operate.

Now, let us drop all this nonsense; let us put that behind us. We are constantly engaged in class legislation. I am not discussing the merits of the shipping bill or of the conference report which was recently defeated in this body. I am simply calling attention to the fact that class legislation is not denounced and never has been denounced in this body since I have been here, unless the class attempted to be helped were the laboring people of the United States. As I have said, the Republican Party, the representatives of which are denouncing this legislation as class legislation, has held itself out as the exponent and proponent of class legislation in every campaign of which I have any recollection. I can not remember the time when the Republican orators did not claim that the principle of protection, the principle of forbidding the American people to purchase their goods where they might and compelling them to restrict their purchases and their operations to a limited number of known and designated men, was not the cause of the wonderful prosperity of the United States. They went further than that and stated that the reason why they did these things, the reason why they restricted the operation of the American people and compelled them to buy in a restricted market, oftentimes without competition, was not to benefit that class; no; it was another class they had in mind; the class they had in mind is the class that we are now really trying to help. They put the burden of that policy on the shoulders of the American laboring man.

They talk about demagogues and talk about claptrap and efforts to catch votes. What has their whole history been? What has it been with reference to this question but a succession and continuation of claptrap and buncombe, intended not only to get votes but to cheat the men from whom they got the votes? They have cheated them, but as soon as the men whom they cheated discovered the partnership and the connection between the Republican Party and those who were fighting the laboring people of this country that party was swept from power.

I listened to the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] yesterday. He advanced, so far as I was able to discover, nothing that had not been advanced by the attorneys of the Manufacturers' Association years and years ago. Those gentlemen have been active in this fight ever since I can remember. On several occasions I came in contact with their agents in my district, and I was frankly informed that any man who stood for the legislation for which I stood could not be elected until every resource at the command of the Manufacturers' Association had been exhausted against him.

To-day I was handed a copy of a night letter which is being sent to Senators at this time, and I will read the body of it without putting in the name of the individual to whom it is addressed. It carries me back a good many years to the time when I was a younger man than I am now, but it is the same in form and the same in substance. This discredited organization, which was utterly disgraced and should have been shamed into silence, is as active to-day as ever it was, but it no longer has the influence it formerly had; it no longer can hold the club, and its threats have no force. Members of the House and Members of the Senate no longer fear the Manufacturers' Association.

I will read this communication now:

> The Clayton bill, exempting labor combinations from the Sherman Act, providing trial by jury for contempts, and radical regulations for business, is now pending in the United States Senate. To overcome belief existing in many quarters that business men are indifferent to this vicious measure and to assist in securing illuminating debate, will you not immediately request and urge your members to make determined and persistent protest against it to your Senator and to ask their associates to do likewise? Immediate action is imperative.
> NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS,
> GEORGE S. BOUDINOT, Secretary.

The National Association of Manufacturers have a perfect right to send out that communication, and I am not objecting to it. It is entitled to all the weight that a communication from such an association is entitled to. I have no quarrel with them. I never had any quarrel with them. Their opposition to me was the source of my greatest strength. The opposition of the National Manufacturers' Association to-day would be the greatest asset I could have in the State of New Jersey. My only fear is that perhaps they will not oppose me; so I look upon their activity now more in sorrow than in anger, and sympathize with them, knowing that they have lost the invaluable services of the delectable Col. Mulhall, although they seem to have enlisted a number of new recruits under their banner. Still, I can not help feeling that the close, intimate, and personal activities of the colonel will be but illy compensated for by the activities of the new recruits to the Manufacturers' Association, so far as I have been able to observe their activities.

I became interested in the Sherman antitrust law and its application to organizations of labor as soon as it was intimated that the law was intended to apply to organizations of labor; and in another body I introduced and had printed—I think I got that far—an amendment providing that it should not so apply. I made a study of the debates, and became familiar with the history of the legislation, and particularly the history of the legislation so far as it referred to its effect upon organizations of labor, and I discovered that nothing in the world was further from the mind of the author of what was known as the Sherman antitrust law than that it should in the slightest degree affect organizations of labor.

The question was raised on the floor of the Senate. I do not like to bore my colleagues with a repetition of these facts. They have been set out over and over again, more than once by me, and a great many times by other Senators. Nevertheless, I will pause to take the time to set out the main features of the history of this legislation so far as it relates to these organizations.

Although the bill apparently, by its terms, and having in mind the object and intent of the legislator who offered it and the legislators who discussed it, had absolutely no application to these men and these organizations. The question was raised on the floor of the Senate, as I recollect, by Senator George, of Mississippi, first. At that time there was a great and powerful organization of labor known as the Knights of Labor. For that matter, they are still in existence and still interested in this sort of legislation. The question was asked whether or not the bill, if enacted into law, would interfere with them in their operations. The answer was that it would not. The answer by the author of the bill was that it could not possibly, by any stretch of the imagination, in any way interfere with the operations of these men. These men were then engaged in doing what the ordinary labor organization is doing to-day. Their organization was practically the same as it is now. Their operations then were about what they are now.

Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, not satisfied with the explanation of the author of the bill, asked further assurances that it was not the intent of the author of the measure or of those who supported it to interfere with these organizations. He called attention to how necessary they were. He called attention to the beneficent results which flowed from their activities. He called attention to the fact that they had inherent and natural rights which must be respected, and that in the effort of the legislature to control and curb the operations and practices of the great combinations of capital which then were afflicting the body politic, great care must be exercised to see that no harm was done to these beneficent organizations, which were interested only in the rights of men and women and children, the blood and bone and sinew of this country, without which the country was nothing; and he, too, was assured by the author of the bill that nothing was further from the minds of the legislators who offered it or of those who supported it.

Not satisfied with that, Senator George then offered an amendment providing in terms that the bill should not affect organizations of labor. That amendment was adopted by the unanimous vote of the Senate.

A peculiar situation existed in this body at that time. There were all sorts of opposition to the Sherman antitrust law. There was open opposition and there was hidden opposition. The hidden opposition took the shape of offering amendments to the bill which were not offered in good faith, and which were not offered with the purpose or object of improving the bill, but in the hope that it would be loaded down and made so objectionable and so obnoxious that on the final vote it could not pass.

The author of the bill called attention to what was going on. He said he was familiar with the methods and the practices that were then being employed. He called the attention of the Senate to the fact that these Senators were not trying to improve or benefit his bill, but that they were trying to load it down with amendments which would make it impossible for even him to vote for it. So far, however, as this amendment was concerned, he said that he was in favor of it; that if it was necessary to keep the courts from attempting to apply this law to organizations of labor, then he wanted it; he would have written it himself. He accepted it fully and completely.

Various other amendments, however, he resisted most vigorously, but in spite of all he could say or do they went in the bill; and at last, when the Senate and the opponents of the legislation had worked their will upon the Sherman antitrust bill as it was first presented, it was in such shape that he himself could not vote for it. His opponents had succeeded in their purpose, and they had so loaded it down with objectionable amendments that the author of the bill himself would not vote for it, and he asked that it be recommitted. As I recollect, he himself asked that it be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee. It went to that committee, and five or six days later it emerged therefrom, and contemporaneous historians say that in the committee it was redrafted, recast, and rewritten by the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar. That seems to be the general understanding and the general agreement now. I am indebted for that piece of information to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who says Senator Hoar sets it out in his autobiography. Senator Edmunds, who for years was regarded as the author of the bill, admits that Senator Hoar really wrote it when it was recommitted to the Judiciary Committee. That Senator, with the sentiments in his breast which caused him to question the legislation, to insist upon its amendment, to ask for a declaration by the author as to what its object was, to point out the beneficent character of these organizations of labor, wrote the bill that we are asked to believe was intended to apply to labor organizations as well as to the Standard Oil Co. and the Sugar Trust, which were then almost the sole objects of the legislative action, because we did not have the brood of trusts and gigantic corporations then that we have to deal with now.

There were, as I recollect, but two industrial combinations which then were raiding the American people, and the legislators had them in mind, and had nothing else and no one else in mind. Senator Hoar of Massachusetts, when he wrote that legislation, had them in mind, and expressly stated that he not only did not have organizations of labor in mind, but that he wanted to protect them, so that by no mischance should they come within the provisions of this drastic law. Yet the highest courts have solemnly said that there is nothing in the bill or in the debates to show that it was not the intention of the Congress to make this law apply to everybody—individuals, corporations, and organizations of every character.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have heard the phase of the history of this law just suggested by the Senator from New Jersey developed here several times; but there is one view of it which I think ought to be borne in mind, and which very greatly strengthens the position now taken by the Senator from New Jersey.

The Sherman bill was not at all like the antitrust law. The thing that was prohibited or made unlawful in the Sherman bill, over which the debate raged for a year or two, and to which the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. George, was offered, was interference with free, full competition. The words "restraint of trade" were not used in that bill. It was thought by some that a prohibition against free, full competition might include labor unions. When, however, the bill went to the Judiciary Committee for the first time—it had theretofore been dealt with in the Finance Committee—and when either Senator Hoar or Senator Edmunds, it makes no difference which one of them it was, wrote a substitute for the bill, the words used were "restraint of trade or commerce," and the thing made unlawful was the restraint of trade or commerce, or monopoly. In my opinion, it never entered the mind of any man of that time that a labor union organized for the benefit of its members and to advance their interests in wages, in hours, in conditions, could be regarded as a restraint of trade. That suggestion was left for a much later period; and I have always thought that this difference between the Sherman bill as it was debated on the floor of the Senate and what we know as the antitrust law emphasized the point that has just been made by the Senator from New Jersey.

I am not saying, of course, that the members of a labor union can not do something that will restrain trade. That is a mere matter of what they do; but a labor union in and of itself, brought together for the purpose of advancing the wages of the members or bettering their condition, was never dreamed of at that time as being in any possible event a restraint of trade.

Mr. HUGHES. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Iowa for his contribution to this discussion. I can see the extreme importance and the relevancy of what he has said, although I confess that if I ever did know it I have forgotten it. I am speaking now entirely from memory, without notes, and relying upon my general recollection of past investigations; but if it is necessary, if there is any honest doubt remaining in the mind of any man—and I confess that for the life of me I can not see how there can be—that it was not the intent of the legislators to make this drastic law apply to organizations of labor, it seems to me it must be dissipated by this fact:

Since the passage of this law, unless these men were either impliedly or expressly exempted from it, they have been existing and operating, a great many of them at least, in absolute and utter violation of it. Can anyone doubt that a strike threatened or carried into effect by a body of men like the Brotherhood of Railroad Engineers of the United States would be a violation of the Sherman law, if it is once admitted that the law is intended to include them within its terms?

We talk about the operations of the Danbury Hat Co. as in some indirect and far-fetched way affecting interstate commerce because it prevented the sale of an article in one State when made in another. But what about the explicit express and intended act of an organization the object of which is to prevent commerce between two States?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] yesterday called attention to a threatened strike of the railroad employees west of Chicago a week or two ago, and he seemed to deplore the fact that this law would make it impossible to enjoin those men in that strike. But suppose the controversy had not been settled and that strike had been called, it was admitted by everybody and it must be admitted by everyone that that would not only restrain commerce, but it would absolutely for the time being destroy it.

Here is an organization of men banded together in combination under an agreement to do something that is not only going to restrain commerce, but is going to end commerce for the time being. Not only that, but they threaten in advance that they are going to conspire together, and then they are going to commit acts in conspiracy. If the Sherman antitrust law applies to organizations of labor, dealing directly or indirectly with goods which enter into interstate commerce, certainly every trainmen's organization operating over a road which traverses two or more States must be in utter violation of this law by the very purpose of its existence.

The primary purpose of its existence is to bargain collectively with their employers for its members. It is to relieve them, to take away the terrific handicap which the individual labors under when he goes to his incorporated employer and tries to make a bargain. They found out a good many hundred years ago that they could make a better bargain with one man speaking for all than when going individually. The union was forced into existence because of hard conditions placed upon employees by employers.

You could destroy every union in the United States in six months, you could destroy a union anywhere as soon as the members of the union became convinced that their employers were men of such character that they would always receive what their services were worth and that they would be treated as they should be treated. The union is only a shield, a protection, a growth made necessary by the hard conditions imposed upon the weak by the strong.

What is the object of the union? The object is to bargain collectively. What power have they? They walk into the office of the president of a railroad company and say, "We are not receiving enough wages," or "We are working too many hours," or "We have to lie over too many hours at this place or that place and waste time away from home for which we do not get paid." The president of the railroad company listens to the demand, talks with them, pleads with them, and argues with them, reasons with them. Why does he do that instead of dismissing them and sending them out? He knows that the members of these railroad unions can work or not, as they like. He knows that these men have the power to stop the wheels of his trains and his locomotives. He knows that these men have the power to stop commerce, to restrain commerce, perhaps to destroy for the time being commerce throughout the territory served by the railroad company.

Is there any question about that? We read frequently in the newspapers of the ultimatums presented by men and the reply by the owners of railroads. Do they not even vote upon it? Have not the polls been published in the newspapers of the United States? No one can doubt, no one ever could doubt but that here was an organization of men the very purpose of which was to restrain, to destroy, if necessary, for the time being commerce between the States, and the more effectively they could make their interruption or restraint of commerce the more likely they were to succeed.

Why is it that for all those years from 1890 down no one has attempted to invoke that law against these railroad organizations? I will tell you why. The railroad organizations are too powerful. The railroad organizations are in a position to interfere with trade and commerce. If the provisions of the law did include them the railroad presidents would be loath to invoke it against them.

But here and there is an organization of men who are not powerful, who are not rich, who have not many connections, and these men have been selected by district attoneys here and an attorney general there for the purpose of testing out this law, of carrying it on, encroaching further and further upon the rights of the laboring people of the country, until within a year or two they became convinced that unless this law was repealed or modified a great war was coming; that, as soon as the heads of the great corporations of the country were satisfied of their position and satisfied of their power, the attempt would finally be made to make that law mean what some boldly say now it means, that every combination, organization, or association that has for its purpose directly or indirectly the impeding or restraining of commerce between the States falls within the provisions of the Sherman law, and that these organizations are criminal per se.

There was a situation existing in another body when this matter first came up which made it impossible for that body to act along certain lines. Bills could be introduced, amendments could be introduced, but careful arrangements had been made that those bills and those amendments should never get beyond the committees to which they were referred. It was comparatively easy to make such arrangements, and they were made. Nevertheless, it was sought to test the sentiment of the other body on this particular question, and an amendment was offered to an appropriation bill four years ago, as I recollect it, and that House, then Republican overwhelmingly, passed that limitation on an appropriation bill which said in effect, which said as nearly as could be said in the limited way in which the House can legislate in that manner, that this law did not and should not be applied to organizations of labor.

That started this fight. The manufacturing associations and the Federation of Labor joined issue in the next campaign. Lists were published of the Members who voted for and of the Members who voted against. The Manufacturers' Association furnished a list of every man who voted in favor of this limitation on the Attorney General's fund which prevented him from the prosecution of organizations of labor under the law; the American Federation and allied organizations furnished a list of the men who voted in favor of the limitation; and those two great organizations, one of them was a great organization and the other was supposed to be a great organization, joined issue and fought that contest on that limitation.

It was some time ago, and I have not paid any attention to it for a long time, but it is my recollection that something like 30 Members of the other body, who took the national manufacturers' side of that question, after a thorough discussion in the campaign, were defeated at the polls, and if my recollection serves me correctly not a single Member who was attacked by the Manufacturers' Association for his vote upon that limitation failed to come back to the House.

It was in that situation that the Democratic Party took control of the House of Representatives, and I had the personal assurance of not less than 10 Republican Members of Congress that the reason why they were defeated was that they had voted against this attempt to take the organizations of labor, as the House could do it at that time, out from within the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law.

The American people do not want oragnizations of labor classed with the Standard Oil Co. and the Sugar Trust. They can see the difference, whether legislators or judges can or not. They know that there is a world of difference between these organizations as organizations and between their acts and practices, and they know there is a world-wide difference between the effect that the acts and practices of the Standard Oil Co. have upon the people of the United States and the effect that the operations of the American Federation of Labor has upon the people of the United States.

I can assure my colleagues in this Chamber that the American people have no difficulty at all in making this distinction. They have made it already, and I can say to my brethren in this body that they, too, should be able to make the distinction.

These men have been conducting this fight against terrific odds for years and years, and the inherent justice of their cause, in my judgment, regardless of what this body or any other legislative body will do for them, has triumphed. Public opinion aroused by them, aroused by the mere exhibition of their wrongs and their grievances, has won this fight for them. We are halting lamely behind that public opinion. When we pass this law we are scarcely abreast of the foremost judges of the land.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and I had a controversy yesterday with reference to whether this legislation was needed or not, and as somebody said about the Equator, a great deal is to be said on both sides. There are judges who are as far apart on this very question as the poles. There are judges who believe that every organization of labor which is in a position to affect directly or indirectly interstate commerce is within the provisions of this law. There are opinions, only recently rendered by the courts, which take the opposite view. We can not afford to leave to occupants of the Federal bench who qualified for their places by serving the National Manufacturers' Association the decision of this question—men who as legislators served other masters than the people; who earned the condemnation of the people and were turned from their service, repudiated; men upon the bench who for those reasons were embittered by their defeat, with their inherent hatred of the laboring people of the country intensified by their humiliation, vented their spleen by racking their brain for a more and more drastic provision to put in their restraining orders. There are some of these gentlemen on the bench yet. I do not want it to be within the power of a single one of them to point to any legislative warrant for what he does.

I regret, of course, that the Judiciary Committee on this side, and on the other side, too, for that matter, did not have the courage of the British Parliament, that they were not as downright thoroughgoing and honest as the British Parliament, which said in terms by means of the trade disputes act that laws of any kind which would interfere with the operation of these bodies should not apply to them. And understand, when we pass this law we leave every organization of labor subject to the laws of the State in which it is located.

I say for the comfort of the gentlemen who in their hearts hate these men, that there is still law enough to fill the penitentiary with representatives of organized and unorganized labor in this country; that every State in the Union, every county prosecutor can harass them, any sheriff can arrest them, every county judge can try them, grand juries can indict, and local juries can convict them and send them to the penitentiary. It is not so in England. The Parliament acted by means of the trade disputes act and said these men should be permitted to conduct their organizations and do a great many of the things we propose to permit them to do here, and a great many other things at which we throw up our hands in holy horror.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Probably I did not understand the Senator correctly, but do I understand him to make the assertion that the Congress of the United States has power to legalize the existence of labor organizations against the laws of the separate States?

Mr. HUGHES. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I may have given that impression but that is not the point I am trying to make. I think I will clear it up in a minute or two. I was simply caling attention to the action of the British Parliament. The criticism I made in which the Senator would be interested was an expression of regret. I am not criticizing the Senator or criticizing his committee. I am as familiar with the history of this legislation as anybody can possibly be and with the history of the present attempt to cure the evils complained of. I have no criticism to make of the Senator. On the contrary, I have found him and the members of his committee to be eager and anxious to cooperate in this movement to the extent that they thought it would be possible to go. I regret that it was not possible to go as far as the British Parliament went. Then I said that when the British Parliament acted it was not acting only upon members of organizations who were engaged in interstate commerce directly or indirectly but that the law ran into every hamlet in England and controlled every county prosecutor and every grand jury and every petit jury and every judge.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator of course understands that that would be impossible under our form of government.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, I understand that it would be impossible. I am just calling attention to the fact that this legislation falls far short, in a Federal way, of what the British Parliament granted to its workingmen. Yet we are compelled because of our dual system of government to leave it subject to the laws of the various States. What would the laboring people have been getting if you had taken them out from within the provisions of this act? What would they have been getting from the Federal Government, when it is admitted that we leave them subject to the laws of every State? Was it too much to ask that they be exempted entirely from the operation of that law?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says that they are left to the laws of each and every State. I do not suppose the Senator means it that way; but it is so often said here that this and that must be left to the States, as if there were a superior virtue in the Congress of the United States to that which exists in the legislatures of the respective States.

I do not think there are any more competent bodies to pass upon questions in the respective States than the legislatures of those States. They make mistakes because they are human, but I do not think that because these matters are left to the States there is any reason to suppose that the States are going to be unfair in the laws which they pass. We have every reason to believe that the laboring men will share in as wise and just legislation at the hands of the States, with reference to those matters which are peculiar in the States, as they would in Congress. Does not the Senator think so?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think anything to the contrary. I was not referring to the fact that this legislation ought to be left to the States. I was simply calling attention to the fact that there is now legislation in practically every State of the Union on this subject of one kind or another, but none going so far as the British Parliament went in the trades-disputes act. No matter if they are not prosecuted under the Sherman Anti-trust Act, or if not prosecuted under the modified law which it is hoped we may here pass, they are still subject to prosecutions in the various counties of the States in which they live. We can not do much for them in the nature of things. Every one of these organizations has its local habitation and its name. It operates through its organization and its officers.

Mr. BORAH. I know, so far as my State is concerned, the legislature enacted labor legislation which was satisfactory to labor in reference to eight hours a day, and protecting them in the mines, and so forth, years before Congress acted upon it.

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly. I do not know whether I am making myself clear or not, but I am simply calling attention to the fact that these men are now resting under a doable load of adverse legislation, because their activities are circumscribed, to a greater or less extent, in every State in the Union. There is not a single State in the Union of which I have any knowledge which has given them legislation as favorable as the British Parliament has given to the workingmen of England. There was no legislature that had the courage to stand up against the assaults of this discredited organizaion, powerful, indeed, at one time; I have seen its agents go to high places in public life in this country. There has not been a legislature of a State in the Union, so far as I know, which was courageous enough to stand up and look this outfit in the eye and do what the British Parliament did for the degraded pauper labor of England and Europe, as the phrase goes. The Senator is undoubtedly familiar with it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. Does not the Senator think that his expression and the expression of the Senator from Idaho that we are leaving anything to the States is the rankest kind of reasoning, but in which the Senator has unfortunately drifted? We can not leave anything to the States. The States are all powerful, except as they grant some power to us. We are now attempting to give within the powers that are granted to us to guarantee such rights and to extend such freedom to labor as we are enabled to do. Can the Senator suggest any other field in which we can legislate except under the grant to regulate interstate commerce? Can the Senator suggest that we can go further in those lines than the House and the Senate seem willing to go at this time?

Mr. HUGHES. I seem to be very unfortunate in my attempts to make myself clear. I did not want anyone to understand that I thought Congress or the Senator's committee should not attempt to legislate on this subject or take away the rights of the States to legislate.

Mr. CHILTON. That is all right. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, but I knew he wanted to be clear about it.

Mr. HUGHES. I am simply trying to call attention to the fact that even if we give everything that is in our power, even if in the express terms we should take these men from within the provisions of the law, we would still leave them subject to the jurisdiction of the various States of the Union, which have all sorts of laws on this subject and none of which are as liberal as the British act of which I spoke, which operates in every part of England. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. CHILTON. Just in this connection, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. Of course that law operates in England, because there is no constitutional limitation there on Parliament.

Mr. HUGHES. I said that in the beginning. I said on account of our dual form of government it was not possible for Congress to do the same thing. I do not want any member of the committee to think in anything I am saying that I am implying criticism. I realize that the members of this committee have gone as far as they thought they could go, and I agree with them. I am in absolute and utter harmony with them, but I would like to go farther. We know the hue and cry that can be and has been raised and is being raised now against all this sort of legislation. We take what we can get. The laboring men of the United States of America have been taking what they could get ever since I can remember. They have, with hat in hand, been haunting the corridors of this Capitol, begging for a chance to be heard. They have been humble and suppliant; they have been asking for a chance to keep their organizations and to perfect them; they have asked for legislation which would put into effect other legislation which was granted to them before a presidential campaign, but which was suspended by the decision of the Attorney General after the campaign. They spent years and years in getting an eight-hour law upon the statute books, a law providing that eight hours should constitute a day's employment on work done by or for the Government. That law had been enacted, I think, back in 1892, with a great flourish of trumpets, and the gentleman who introduced it in the other body went into the campaign in the State of Ohio as the author of that great measure. Although he had previously been defeated for Congress, he introduced that measure in the short session, during which he had yet to serve before his term expired, and the bill was passed. He then went into the campaign as the author of that bill and was returned as governor of the State by an overwhelming majority, and afterwards became the President of the United States as the father of the eight-hour law, a law which was suspended by a decision of the Attorney General before the returns were counted. From that time on——

Mr. BORAH. The eight-hour law was suspended by the Attorney General?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not mean actually suspended by order of the Attorney General, but they put a comma in or took a comma out of the law, and then building, construction, and other work done by or on behalf of the Government could be carried on under an 8-hour day or a 16-hour day or any other kind of a day.

I called the attention of the man who is now supposed to be the great exponent of the laboring people of this country, then President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, to the fact that there was being built a great reservoir in the city of Washington, that there was an eight-hour law upon the statute books, that the Republican Party had taken great pride in the fact that it had passed that law, that a revered and honored member of their party, then dead, had been pointed to as the author of that law; and I told him that I had been on the ground and had seen the work being carried on; that the work was being done by and for the Government directly, without the intervention of any contractor, the Government engineers being in charge and in control of it, and that they were operating under a 10-hour day, working two shifts 10 hours each, one shift working by electric light. I called his attention to that myself in person so that there would not be any question about it. I wanted to ascertain the facts. That was in the old days when public men did not have to be sincere, when men were only expected to make pretense about election time. They did not rely upon the people for nomination; they did not rely upon the people for election. Politics was a game of buncombe; and the man who most successfully practiced buncombe was the most successful politician. That day has passed.

Mr. BORAH. It must be since the Panama Canal tolls bill was passed.

Mr. HUGHES. I will not permit the Senator from Idaho to divert me. I called the attention of the then President of the United States to the fact that this vaunted eight-hour law had virtually been suspended by the decision of the Attorney General in various instances, and that, whatever the merit of the Attorney General's decision was, there could not be any question in this particular case that that $3,000,000 worth of work was being done in the District of Columbia for the Government and by the Government, and that the law was being violated. To make a long story short, there was considerable correspondence which I returned by request. I was informed that this was an emergency proposition. I did not even take the trouble to call the attention of the President to the fact that on an emergency proposition they could work 24 hours a day instead of 20 hours, three 8-hour shifts instead of two shifts of 10 hours. That was in 1904, as I recollect. It was not until last year or the year before last that the laboring people of this country were able to get on the statute books legislation overcoming that decision of the Attorney General.

They have not asked for much and they have gotten a great deal less. I started out by saying that I would like to have seen the Congress of the United States pass an act reading something like this:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act done in pursuance of an agreement or combination by two or more persons shall, if done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, not be actionable unless the act, if done without any such agreement or combination, would be actionable.

I wish we could even have gotten that far. There is nothing in this bill which goes so far as that. The first paragraph of the British trades-dispute act—and, as I said a while ago, that act runs into every nook and corner of the Kingdom and is controlling upon every prosecuting officer and every grand and petit juror—reads:

It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting on their own behalf or on behalf of a trade-union or of an individual employer or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend, at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working.

That meat was too strong for the gentle stomachs of the American people, as their views are expressed by the Manufacturers' Association and kindred associations. That language could not have been adopted; that language is not in this bill. The act continues:

An action against a trade-union, whether of workmen or masters, or against any members or officials thereof on behalf of themselves and all other members of the trade-union in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the trade-union, shall not be entertained by any court.

They seem to have gone mad over there. Parliament seems to be absolutely and utterly bereft of reason. Evidently they can not see any relation at all between an ordinary conspirator who is conspiring to murder somebody or to burglarize his house and labor unions. The British Parliament sees the widest distinction between those two kinds of conspirators. They seem to think that the interests of the British workmen are paramount and supreme over the necessities of everybody else in the land, and that they can permit them to organize and encourage them to organize and make it possible for them to procure reasonable wages and to enforce sanitary conditions, and that they in turn perhaps will be able to educate and feed their children and bring them up as they should be brought up. They seem to have some sort of an illusion that that will be a good thing for the British Empire.

We are under no illusion over here. There is not a State in the Union, so far as I know, that has an act of this kind or one so liberal as this. We know that it is not even attempted here to come within miles of it; and it is known that even if we did we still would leave these men subject to the various jurisdictions in which they live and operate. No; we prate about the American workman in our political platforms and we excuse the system of tariff robbery on the ground that the robbers are going to hand their plunder down to the workers. There is only one way in which they can be compelled to hand it down; there is only one weapon that will permit an American workman to plunge his hand into the employer's pocket and get his share of the loot that has been wrung from the American people, and that is the strike. One of these conspiracies, one of these combinations and agreements that may be in restraint of trade is the only weapon he has had, but you have given his employers themselves many; you have permitted them to capture this loot, and you have said you have done so on behalf of these American workmen. That is what you said; your platforms reek with it; there is not a platform that you have adopted for the past 25 or 30 years that does not say that. You pride yourselves upon being class legislators. You have two classes—employers and employees. You give the employers the right to loot and plunder, and you say we do so because we know they will pass it down. As the present Secretary of State one time said, you have appointed the employers trustees, you have made them executors or administrators, but you have not asked them to give bond.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. It is hardly necessary, I think, to comment on the language of the Senator referring to the benefits of a protective tariff.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not insist that the Senator comment on it.

Mr. WEEKS. But it seems to me that if there is any connection between high wages and the legislation to which the Senator has been referring as prevailing in Great Britain we would naturally expect to see better wages in Great Britain than here; and he knows, just as everybody knows, that the wages here are from 25 to 100 per cent higher in the same industries than they are in that country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The American workman possibly performs from 25 to 100 per cent more work than does the average Englishman. Our workmen do not get any more than they are entitled to at that.

Mr. HUGHES. What difference does the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts make? I do not care to discuss that with the Senator. I can reply to the Senator by saying that even if his statement is true, which it may or may not be, yet——

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator knows it is true, does he not?

Mr. HUGHES. No; I do not know that it is true, as the Senator states it; but even assuming that it is true, the British workman is getting twice as much—and perhaps that is as nearly true as the Senator's statement—as is his French brother, who is living under a high protective policy; but I do not care to go into that.

Mr. WEEKS. But that statement, Mr. President, is not correct.

Mr. HUGHES. I think it is more correct than the Senator's statement; but we can not decide that now.

The fact remains that the Senator will probably vote against this bill. I do not know as to that. I hope he will not do so; but he probably will vote against it, or against this provision at any rate. He never had any idea in his mind when he voted for the protective tariff to do anything except to benefit the laboring people of this country, but I want to tell him now that if he wants to benefit the laboring people of this country he should give them a chance to combine and organize, to enter into combinations and agreements which may or may not restrain trade, so that they can deal collectively and effectively with their employers. Then they will get even higher wages than the wages which the Senator thinks now are so generous, but which the laboring people of Fall River did not think were so generous a year or two ago, which my people in the city of Paterson did not think were so generous, and which I myself do not think were generous.

Mr. WEEKS. But the Senator puts words in my mouth which I did not use.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I withdraw them.

Mr. WEEKS. I did not say that wages were generous or overgenerous; I said that wages were materially higher, and if the laws of Great Britain were so favorable to the laboring men, we would naturally suppose that they would benefit because of them.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator does not have to take my opinion with reference to the laws of England being favorable to the laboring men. The Senator can read the proposed legislation now pending, and he can read the law which is on the statute books of England, and I will take his judgment as to whether or not the English law is more favorable on this particular question.

Now, I can not be diverted into a tariff discussion. The Senator is familiar with my views on that subject and I am familiar with his. The tariff has not anything to do with this matter, except that your tariff has been perpetrating a fraud and humbug upon the laboring people of this country for years by pretending that a high tariff rate is for the benefit of the laboring people. If you were interested in the laboring people you would be in favor of legislation which would permit them to organize and to operate as organizations in order to protect themselves against combinations of capital which are so much more powerful than they are.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the Senator has so often in his remarks undertaken to make a partisan question of this matter and has charged up to a political party all the sins that have come from bad legislation on this particular subject, I want to ask him if he charges the deficiencies of this legislation now pending to the Republican Party? If he claims that the bill now before the Senate does not go to the extent to which he thinks it ought to go, why not, then, put the responsibility on the Democratic Party, for they are certainly in power now?

Mr. HUGHES. They are perfectly willing to take that responsibility.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator ought to place the responsibility where it belongs, then.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is as familiar with the situation that exists here as I can possibly be.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I understand the situation.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator has had legislative experience enough to know that frequently a party may be in control, and yet the defection of a few men, united with a determined minority, can defeat legislation.

Again, I wish to say that I do not expect the Democratic Party to follow me blindly in these matters, or to go as far as I would have them go. I am simply trying to show you where I should like to have them go. I do not want the Senator to say that I am attempting to give a partisan tinge to this question.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to do so; but I have been surprised somewhat at some of the things the Senator has said, because I have been familiar with the Senator's activities in Congress. I entered the House at the same time he did, and I voted for certain propositions there affecting labor, just as he did; but he undertakes here every little while to put the responsibility for the lack of legislation on the Republican Party, and then gives a bouquet to the Democratic Party for what they are doing, and in the next breath says that what is being done now is not at all satisfactory; that it is not at all equal to what has been done over in England. Just as a matter of fairness, it seems to me that the Senator——

Mr. HUGHES. I think I have been absolutely fair——

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). Ought to place the responsibility where it properly rests.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not thrown any bouquets at anybody. I very frankly stated that, even if we did everything that the British Parliament did with reference to this question, we would still be leaving the laboring men subject to the laws of the various jurisdictions.

Mr. NORRIS. But we are not doing that; we do not propose to do that by the bill now pending. Does the Senator think that the President would like to have that done?

Mr. HUGHES. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. It is true that when he signed the bill that was once vetoed by President Taft containing the restriction as to the use of funds allotted for prosecutions under the Sherman law, he also signed a notation in connection with it in which he expressed the same views that President Taft had expressed when he vetoed the same proposal.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say that I do not know whether or not the President would be as willing to go as far as the trades-dispute act goes, because I have never discussed that question with him. I was not a member of either committee having jurisdiction of the matter, and I had no desire to be officious or to attempt to shape legislation with which I had no particular or exclusive connection. I will say, however, that I am perfectly familiar with the reasons why the President made the memorandum with reference to the limitation on the sundry civil bill, and I agree with him in the main. The amendment to the sundry civil bill, as the Senator will recollect, was offered because of a situation which existed in a certain body with which the Senator is more familiar than any man in the United States. The Senator is not going to deny, I know, that committees were choked in a certain legislative body, and that action could not be had along certain lines. The Senator was as vigorous an opponent of the policy that resulted in those things as there was anywhere in the United States—I might say the most vigorous opponent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUGHES. Just let me finish this sentence, and then I will yield.

That amendment was offered as a limitation upon an appropriation bill for the purpose of testing the sense of the other House. It tested the sense of the House, and served its purpose. I do not think it is wise legislation to tie up a fund with a limitation: I do not think it is good legislation to abolish a judge by refusing to appropriate for his salary; I think the best way is to honestly abolish his office, and if I had been the President of the United States I would have been tempted to say something such as he said. I was the author of the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HUGHES. I first yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I recognize that the Senator was the author of that amendment, and he offered it in the House of Representatives before the present administration came into power. I was one of the Senator's supporters on that occasion and helped in my weak way to put that proposition on an appropriation bill. Then later a similar provision was put on an appropriation bill that was sent to President Wilson.

Mr. HUGHES. I can not accept the Senator's statement as to his help being weak.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator was not asserting when he was putting the question up to a Republican President that it was improper to enact such legislation, but when a Democratic President takes the same ground he assists him in making his apology. Now, I can see only this difference—and I am surprised to-day that the Senator has so often intimated it in his remarks, because I have always thought a great deal of his independence in the stand that he has taken since he has been a Member of Congress—that he condemns an action if it originates in one political party and apologizes for it when it is consummated by another political party.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator insists on quarreling with me, but I do not want him to quarrel with me, because he is too good a friend of mine and we have fought shoulder to shoulder on too many occasions for us to part over a fancied difference now, for there is no real difference between us.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not quarreling with the Senator on this provision of the bill; I am in favor of this provision.

Mr. HUGHES. I understand that; I know that without asking.

Mr. NORRIS. And I want to see it enacted into law; but the Senator is not satisfied with it. I am not saying that his proposition would not be better than the one proposed, but because he wants to go further, it seems to me—perhaps I am wrong in my conclusions—because this provision in the bill does not suit him, he is condemning another political party, that is now out of power, because they have not enacted any law along the lines of the British law, and then he turns to his party, which is in power, and says, "You have gone as far as you could be expected to go; you have done well; it is all right; everything is lovely; you have done just what you ought to have done." It occurs to me the rule ought to work both ways.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the Senator does me a great injustice there. When I referred to our attempt to get another party to act, I was referring to the eight-hour bill, which was enacted into law precisely as we had been attempting and as I had been attempting to get another party to enact it into law.

The laboring people of the United States are satisfied with this legislation. They are afraid to jeopardize their chances of getting any legislation, because they have not much confidence in the real regard of the Congress—I will put it in that way—for them, and they are afraid to jeopardize their chances of getting any legislation by insisting upon getting more than there is in this bill as it came from the House. They are satisfied, and nobody is authorized to go any further in their name. So much for that.

I have been constantly referring to the attitude of the Republican Party toward the laboring people of this country, because the speeches which have been made against this proposition have been made against it in the main on the ground that it was class legislation. It is unfortunate that I have not made myself clear. I have a vivid recollection of the service that was rendered by the Senator from Nebraska and a great many other members, not only of the Progressive Party but a great many members of the Republican Party, for the limitation upon the Attorney General's fund went on a bill in a Republican House. The first time that it ever was offered and the first time, in my recollection, that either House of Congress had expressed its opinion as to whether or not the Sherman law did include or ought to include organizations of labor was at that time when the House was under Republican control.

I regret if I have appeared to show any spirit of partisanship in this matter, because it is not a partisan matter, and ought not to be a partisan matter. It is within the power of the Senate now to give the organizations of labor everything for which they are asking in this bill. Practically, it is possible to take organized labor out of politics in this country and let them divide along natural lines, as they ought to divide. Nobody would deplore more than I the building up of a class-conscious party of any kind in this country.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have been rather interested in the Senator's views as to how labor can get higher wages. As I understand the Republican policy which he criticizes so severely, its purpose is to put a larger sum into the countingroom. The desire of the Senator from New Jersey is that out of the sum that goes into the countingroom a larger precentage shall go to labor, but he criticizes the policy which gives a larger sum to divide.

It seems perfectly evident to me that a policy which tries to put a dollar where it can be divided between capital and labor is infinitely superior to a policy which only puts 50 cents where it can be so divided, and that the division which goes to labor, even if it is only 75 per cent, is immensely greater when it is 75 per cent of a dollar than though it were 85 per cent of a half dollar. Neither labor nor capital can obtain more than the whole of what exists. The Republican policy, from the origination of that party, has been to make a larger fund that can be divided between the parties between whom it must be divided—those who contribute the labor and those who contribute the capital.

Mr. HUGHES. That is true; that is what I was trying to say; but the Senator has said it better than I could possibly have said it. I do not want to get into a discussion of the protective policy; I was only calling attention to it incidentally, as I tried to explain, to show that the Republican Party is not opposed to class legislation, because the Republican tariff laws have been class legislation. You are then legislating for a class, a class of employers and employees. I only touched on that incidentally.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator allow me just one moment?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator has said several times in the last 10 minutes that he did not want the tariff question to enter into the discussion of the matter which he is considering, but almost before the words are out of his mouth he begins again to attack the tariff policy of the Republican Party. It is very comfortable for him to say "I will attack a Republican policy, but Senators on the other side must not say a word, because I do not want that policy discussed." If the Senator does not want it discussed, would it not be well to refrain from attacking it?

Mr. HUGHES. I have to carry on this discussion in my own way. I am not compelled to yield to the Senator; I can do as he did a day or two ago and decline to yield.

Mr. LIPPITT. On what occasion?

Mr. HUGHES. When the Senator made his last speech, as I recollect, he signified a desire not to be interrupted.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have no recollection of having done so. I think one year ago or so I made a carefully prepared speech, and may then have expressed a desire of that kind.

Mr. HUGHES. I have a right to carry on this discussion in my own way.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have no desire to interrupt the Senator, if he does not want to be interrupted.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not said that I did not want to be interrupted, but I do not like the Senator to direct my remarks into channels which are foreign to the purpose of my argument. I am going to say now that I have not made any attempt to discuss the protective theory as a policy. I have simply called attention to the fact—and I know the Senator will admit it—that the Republican Party is devoted to that theory. It believes in the protective principle. The Senator will admit that, undoubtedly.

Mr. LIPPITT. I even glory in it.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; undoubtedly. The Senator will also admit that the protective theory contemplates that a man will have the privilege, which is denied to others, of doing business in a certain territory, the aim being for him to get——

Mr. LIPPITT. I will admit that it involves the theory of having an American citizen do things in America that are denied to a German or to an Englishman or to a Frenchman. I do not admit that it denies to any one American citizen the right to do what any other American citizen can do.

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly; I understand the Senator's position; but the protective theory is that a manufacturer will get a little more money for his goods than he would if the country were opened up to foreign competition, and that in turn he will be enabled to pay more wages than he would be able to pay if the country were opened up to foreign competition. The Senator will surely admit that?

Mr. LIPPITT. I would not put it just that way. I would put it a little differently; but the Senator says he does not want to discuss the tariff, and if we go on we will have a very lengthy discussion.

Mr. HUGHES. I know. I do not want to discuss it; but I thought those were protective axioms. I did not know that I was stating anything debatable; and I was then calling attention to the fact that the Senator's party was on record as desiring to favor the American laboring people as a class.

Mr. LIPPITT. Surely.

Mr. HUGHES. That it was class legislation, and they would stand for it so far as it was involved in the protective theory; that is all. I never made a single word of attack upon the protective theory.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator would not confine his remarks to the statement that the protective policy is designed to favor the laborer entirely, to the exclusion of other people in the United States, I might agree with him. I do not understand that the Republican protective policy means that. I understand that the benefit Republicans think accrues from that policy is distributed over the entire American people.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I know. The benefits that will flow from this policy will be distributed over the entire United States, but the direct beneficiaries of the protective tariff——

Mr. LIPPITT. Are the people of the United States.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, the direct beneficiary, first, is the man who gets a little more for his goods than he would get if the country were opened up to foreign competition. Surely the Senator and I can agree on that. The Senator ought to be fair and candid with me. I am trying to be fair and candid with him.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator is leading me into strange paths, however, or trying to do so.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator finds those paths fairly familiar, but I shall not pursue the discussion any further now. I must insist on saying, however, whether it harrows the Senator's feelings or not, that the Republican Party has claimed to be guilty of class legislation in favor of the laboring people of the United States. I do not think they have. I acquit them, so far as I am concerned; but they have claimed, and they have written it into their platforms, that they have legislated and that they are going to legislate in the interest of the laboring people. They are going to tax, they are going to keep the protective policy in force, not because of its inherent virtues and beauties altogether, but because, directly or indirectly, it helps the laboring men of the United States of America.

Mr. LIPPITT. I agree with that.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course the Senator agrees with that, and that is what I have been saying all along.

Mr. LIPPITT. But I do not agree that it helps only the laboring people.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course the Senator's theory is that after that those benefits are handed down. That is the difference between the Senator's theory and mine.

Mr. LIPPITT. And that is all the difference between the position in which the Senator is trying to place this tariff policy and the position in which I place it. He is trying to argue that it favors only one class. He then goes on to say that it favors all classes, which I agree with.

Mr. HUGHES. I say that the Senator believes it favors all classes. There is no use in my saying to the Senator that I do not believe in his theory. I do not believe in it any more than he believes in mine, but I do not want to discuss it. We have not the time to discuss it. I am simply calling attention to the fact that it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator to criticize this side of the Chamber, or any other body, for passing so-called class legislation, because his whole theory——

Mr. LIPPITT. Does the Senator believe class legislation is right?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I believe in class legislation.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator believes in passing laws that favor one particular class in opposition to other particular classes?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes. For instance, take this provision in this bill——

Mr. LIPPITT. I just wanted a statement of the broad, general principle. The Senator says he thinks class legislation is right.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator has just admitted that the protective theory involves a favor to the working class.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have not admitted it at all in the way the Senator means it. I have said, over and over again, that it involves a benefit to all the people. Now, the Senator says that he believes legislation ought to be passed which favors one class to the disadvantage of the others.

Mr. HUGHES. Why, certainly. The Constitution of the United States provides for a class. The Constitution of the United States provides that the press shall be free. If I threaten you with an injury, you may bind me over to keep the peace; you may take other steps; but if a newspaper of the United States threatens to make an attack on you, which may destroy you politically and socially, it is permitted to do it. It takes the consequences and pays for the consequences afterwards; but it can do it. You will find other classes provided for in the Constitution of the United States. Let me call your attention to a class in the bill now before us as it came over from the House. It has been stricken out by the Senate committee, for what reason I do not know; I hope not for the reason that it was class legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator right there, if he will, whether I understand him correctly. If I understood him aright, he said that the press had rights that individuals do not have?

Mr. HUGHES. A man in the newspaper business has rights that other men have not.

Mr. McCUMBER. What right has he to defame another man's character, or to make any false statement, or to do anything else, that an individual has not?

Mr. HUGHES. Why, he has an absolute right to do it. He can not be prevented by injunction from doing it, under the Constitution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Neither can the individual.

Mr. HUGHES. The individual can be prevented from doing lots of things.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to know just one thing, if the Senator can point it out to me, that the owner of a paper can do through the instrumentality of his paper that an individual can not do.

Mr. HUGHES. He can injure a man; he can publish a defamatory statement about a man; he can give notice that he is about to do it, and he can continue to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would that protect him any more than it would an individual?

Mr. HUGHES. Why, yes; the individual——

Mr. McCUMBER. Is there any difference between the law of libel and the law of slander, so far as the rights of the citizen are concerned, whether he be libeled by the press or slandered by the individual?

Mr. HUGHES. Why, yes. An individual can be bound over to keep the peace. If he were making verbal statements or written statements calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, he could be bound over. You can not bind a newspaper over.

Mr. McCUMBER. I admit that the press can not threaten that it will do anything of itself against a man.

Mr. HUGHES. A newspaper can go on publishing from day to day defamatory and libelous articles about the Senator, and he can not enjoin it. He can not stop it.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator can have his action for damages against the newspaper, the same as he would against the individual.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, yes; I started out by saying that.

Now, I want to read another specimen of class legislation which I approve of absolutely—that is, so far as any objection to it is concerned on account of its being class legislation. With the merits of the matter I am not familiar. I do not pretend to be familiar with it, but as this bill came over from the House it contained the language I am about to read. Now, this is a bill which prevents the existence of certain combinations and groups of men, and all that, and prevents combined action along certain lines. It contains this language:

> Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission, and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers, parties thereto, and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission, but no such agreement shall go into effect or become operative until the same shall have first been submitted to, and approved by, the Interstate Commerce Commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic, or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates.

I quote that simply for the purpose of showing that when you are drawing a broad, comprehensive, and sweeping statute which is going to apply all over the United States of America it is likely to come in contact not only with other laws, but with customs and practices, and by virtue of being a later enactment wipe them out. Of course, it is class legislation. The interstate-commerce act is class legislation. I can charge a poor, unfortunate client of mine as much money as I can get from him for my services as a lawyer; but the Erie Railroad, which runs through my town, can not charge me what it likes to carry me to the city of New York, because we have made a class out of railroads. A corporation is permitted to do certain things which individuals can not do. Individuals are permitted to do certain things which corporations can not do. The man who holds the stock of a corporation can limit his liability in business to the assets of the corporation, because we have made a class out of corporations. The individual, on the other hand, may have all his earthly goods swept away by an industrial calamity.

We have provided that workingmen who are in the employ of a concern which goes bankrupt shall be preferred; and the first act that a receiver performs when he comes into possession of the assets of the derelict industrial concern is to make the necessary arrangements at the bank and pay wages. That is absolutely class legislation. I am in favor of certain kinds of class legislation and I am in favor of this legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from New Jersey has finished with this particular subject I should like to ask him to return to another with which he has already dealt. I do not quite like the way in which he has left the comparison of the English statute with the laws of the United States. The English statute in substance abolishes the distinction between individual action and combined action. That is all it does.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, it does more than that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; it does. It says, in substance, that people can not be held liable for concerted action if the same thing done by an individual would have been lawful.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course that is a tremendous addition; but that is not all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will call attention to that. Now, that is all right. Of course the Congress of the United States could not do that, but I think the Senator from New Jersey entirely misunderstands what the application of the English doctrine would be under the antitrust law.

The antitrust law forbids restraint of trade. It makes no difference whether the restraint of trade is accomplished by an individual, by one man, or by 100 men, whether it is accomplished singly or in concert. If we had the English statute, whoever restrained trade would be liable under the law, whether a single person restrained it or whether a thousand persons acting together restrained it. In other words, the offense under our statute is not the combination to restrain trade, but it is the restraint of trade; and therefore, if the English statute were in full force in the United States and in all the States, the result would be just the same. If to do certain things would be to restrain trade, and the English had such a statute as ours, that act would be unlawful.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree with the Senator. I did not mean to be understood as saying that the literal language of the British act would be satisfactory here, or would meet the needs and requirements of the situation here as I see them. I am simply calling attention to the difference between the attitude of the British Government and the attitude of the American Government.

I will say, in deference to my friends here who have been disposed to criticize me for being partisan on this subject, that in the Taff Vale case, when it was demonstrated that organizations of labor in England could be held responsible for going on strike when that strike took the shape of a conspiracy and resulted in damages to an employer of labor, and those damages could be traced back to the men who went on the strike, to their friends who paid them while they stayed out, to their organization which kept them in funds and which encouraged them and persuaded them to persist in the strike—when it became demonstrated that the unions could be held liable for that, and when they were held liable for a large sum of money, £150,000, which they paid, then the British Parliament acted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not at all disparaging the English statute, nor am I suggesting that it has not a very great effect. I am only saying that so far as restraint of trade is concerned it would do no good whatsoever to enact the English statute.

Mr. HUGHES. No; I agree with that.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a difference, in the broad field of human activity, between the lawfulness of the action of a single man and the action of a hundred men in conspiracy or in combination. One man may often do something that would be entirely innocent for the man to do, but which would be criminal for a hundred or a thousand men to do in combination. Therefore, the English statute had a great field for operation; but so far as the restraint of trade is concerned, that is the unlawful thing, and it is just the same whether it is restrained by one man or by a thousand men.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; but the restraint of trade was the thing in the Taff Vale case.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator from New Jersey is laboring under a great misapprehension as to the scope of the English trade legislation. While in some respects it is very liberal, yet it contains restrictions that we have not known of or thought of in this country. I want to read to the Senator, with his permission, section 5 of the act of August 13, 1875:

> Where any person willfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service or of hiring, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences of his so doing, either alone or in combination with others, will be to endanger human life or cause serious bodily injury or to expose valuable property, whether real or personal, to destruction or serious injury, he shall, on conviction thereof by a court of summary jurisdiction or on indictment as hereinafter mentioned, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned for a term of not exceeding three months with or without hard labor.

Then I read section 7 of the same act, which is still in force:

> Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority—
> 1. Uses violence to or intimidates such other person or his wife or children or injures his property; or
> 2. Persistently follows such other person about from place to place; or
>
> 3. Hides any tools, clothes, or other property owned or used by such other person or deprives him of or hinders him in the use thereof; or
> 4. Watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be or the approach to such house or place; or
> 5. Follows such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road—
